Gaddis, a clergyman well known in the East during his lifetime. A natural penchant, she says, induced her to make the step, the indulgence of which while a minister's will she was of course debarred. He had often permitted her to give readings in connection with his lectures, and the success she met with as an elocutionist convinced she possessed sufficient dramatic talent. which, given an opportunity of development, would enable her to reach the position to which her mind aspired. When thrown upon her own resources for support, she placed herself under the tutorage of competent instructors in New York, and for ten years studied the rudiments of her chosen profession with the utmost assidulty. A few mouths ago she made her debut at Mrs.
