Death of Mr. Jefferson.

"Hung be the heavens with black."
Petersburg, July 7.—Yesterday's 12 o'clock mail brought us the melancholy intelligence of the death of the great and good, the immortal JEFFERSON. He died on the anniversary of that day, which sealed the disenfranchisement of this land from the yoke of British tyranny, and perhaps at the very hour of the day when he signed the sacred instrument of our emancipation. We cannot accompany the following announcement of this event by a single remark, further than to observe, that he died full of years and full of glory, a patriot without reproach, a citizen without guile, a man without stain or blemish, with as pure a spirit as ever was stamped with intelligence by the hand of Omnipotence.—Republican.

RICHMOND, July 6.

THOMAS JEFFERSON is no more! He breathed his last on the very day which he has forever marked with his name.—What a remarkable coincidence! Fifty years from the Declaration of Independence—on the very day, and it is said the very hour on which it was read, this great man expired.

The following are extracts of letters from Charlottesville on Tuesday. They came by the Charlottesville mail, last evening.—Compiler.

Charlottesville, July 4, 3 o'clock.

"THOMAS JEFFERSON died to-day, ten minutes before one o'clock, P. M."

Extract of another letter, same place and day.
"The latest accounts from Monticello (up to 12 o'clock to-day) brings the unwelcome tidings that Mr JEFFERSON is lingering upon the threshold of eternity."
P. S. 2 o'clock.—Mr. JEFFERSON is no more. He died at ten minutes before one o'clock; the day and hour too, on which the Declaration of Independence was read."
