PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

FROM THE CARE-FEAR RECORDED.

Men who are brought into notice through the influence of wealth and powerful friends, and have possessed themselves of classic lore through these means possess but a negative kind of virtue, when compared with those who have by their own industry solely, obtained the confidence and respect of mankind. If there can be any thing calculated to excite our admiration and wonder, it must be the spectacle of a man's rising through the gloomy scenes of adverse fortune to honorable eminence—surmounting the difficulties attendant on a lonely existence amidst a thoughtless and unfeeling world, and successfully battling, as it were, the stern billows of fate itself. The character of such a man is identified with all that is honorable and excellent—no obstacle is too difficult to surmount in order to the accomplishments of his wise and good designs—no labor is too arduous for his extensive mind, and no temptation can lead him from the paths of rectitude and honor. Such a man is Mr. Crawford. Early disciplined in the school of adversity, he has given us sufficient evidence of the vast resources of his mind, which has exalted him to the highest offices in his own state, and placed him among the most eminent men in the service of the republic. There are some men, it is true, even in our republican country, who scoff at a want of "birth and fortune," as it is termed; who lay the whole weight in the scale of intelligence on the side of family pretensions. But who are they? And their ancestors, what were they? They are themselves, frequently, the useless scum of society, living in idleness and dissipation, and setting deplorable examples to their less wealthy countrymen; bestowing no service on the nation, by which they can have any claim to her countenance or gratitude. Their ancestors, belike, the bloated traitors of the revolution, who fatten on the blood of the friends of liberty. We consider "birth and fortune" as blessings when improved as such; but he who has nothing else to recommend himself, deserves the most unlimited scorn. But we will not seek the good opinion of such men, nor be influenced or affected by their smiles or their frowns. It is no small matter of exultation with many good men, that President Adams had been a shoemaker's apprentice, and Franklin a journeyman printer, and that both these great men were the architects of their own fortunes and fame—one being the son of a tallow-chandler the other of a shoemaker. When Mr. Crawford shall have ascended the Presidential chair, we can show to the world sufficient evidence that virtue and talent are in this country, the surest passports to glory and honor.

We feel gratified in recollecting the magnanimity displayed by Mr. Crawford at the last presidential election. The public mind seemed to be awhile suspended, as loth to choose between men whose claims were so strong and so equal as those of Mr. Crawford and our present excellent chief magistrate. He resigned his pretensions rather than distract the election, although a large number of his republican friends did not give him up without the greatest reluctance. This conduct exalted him in the estimation of the nation, and from thenceforth he was considered as the most deserving of the ensuing election. We believe these are facts well established, although his opposers disbelieve it, and endeavor to charge him with opposition to the last, and torture this opposition into a crime. This is strange reasoning. If Mr. Crawford did oppose Mr. Monroe, what greater crime could it be in him at that time, than it now is in Mr. Adams or Mr. Calhoun in opposing Mr. Crawford? This accusation recoils with double force on Mr. C's accusers—for if it were a crime, it was but a transient one; while on the other hand the fault is persevered in after conviction. But the truth is, every man has a right to urge his pretensions, against every opposition when his friends have once brought him to the field of trial. Placed in such a situation, no man deserves reproof for not falling from the contest; but is justifiable in endeavoring to command all the influence of his friends in his service. When we speak of friends we do not allude to those who are merely personal, for we sincerely hope that no private attachment will influence the election, unless attended with an unqualified respect for the moral and political principles of the candidate. We are convinced that the advancement of Mr. Crawford will depend, however, upon no slight or capricious circumstance; that the cause will flow from the general voice of the people, founded on a conviction of his worthiness. Let the enquiring eyes of freemen search into the inmost recesses of his political or moral character—he has no motive for concealment—his wisdom and patriotism will not preserve him from the lash of censure, nor his virtues and amiable disposition escape scandal; but still we look with confidence for his complete triumph, growing out of the affections of the people.

An under-lying course of rectitude, and a sincere devotion to the best interests of his country, through a long course of public life, have brought Mr. Crawford to the view of his countrymen for the Presidency. Those who have noticed him in all the situations in which he has been placed, entertain the most favorable sentiments, and desire his election. It is true he does not come loaded with honor from the field of blood, and our country will be in a wretched state of danger when this shall be essential in similar cases—but he brings evidences of the faithful discharge of his duty and of superior ability, in offices of the greatest trust and responsibility.

As to the section of country in which a good man is born; it is of the extremest indifference; although it would, unquestionably, be more agreeable to the national feeling, if a person could be alternately selected from different quarters of the Union—but it does not follow, that the worst man should be excluded on account of his birth place. And our readers will observe, by reference to a piece published this day, from a northern paper, that no such objection has arisen with the republicans there; for which circumstance we feel grateful, and think it redounds to their honor, as it convinces us that the interest of the republic is the only object of our northern political brethren. No stone, however, will be left unturned by the opposition, to perplex the proceedings of the majority in this election; it therefore becomes the friends of sound republican doctrine to be on the alert, lest time and neglect should mould weakness into a shape of alarming magnitude. We observe that the same stale assertions are brought into requisition now, that were used against the three last Presidents—ruin to the country is to ensue, in case of Mr. Crawford's election, &c. If the same ruin succeeds his election, which did that of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, we shall be very happy at the result; and we have no question but that such will be the case. Why such odious language is used, we cannot conceive—it certainly evinces a want of good argument and tenable ground. Who can be made to believe such freedom and unsupported charges? The declaration, that Mr. C. will ruin the country, is ridiculous—so, "when the sky falls we shall catch larks." What evidence is here that this public calamity will happen?—None—Not the least shadow of it can be drawn from any act in the past life of Mr. C.—it rests on the bare assertion of inveterate opposition, and is not admitted into any calm discussion. We trust accusations of this kind will command no respect—let facts, alone, be brought forward against Mr. Crawford, and he is able, undistractedly, to defy his enemies at any point. Secure in his integrity, he seeks nothing but truth, by whose purity he is not fearful of being tried.
