THE TABLE ROCK. Description of the Table Rock of South

Carolina, in a letter from a Gentleman to his friend in Charleston. GREENVILLE, (S. C. May, 1827.

My Dear E-The back-woods of South Carolina afford to the lover of romantic scenery, some of the grandest specimens of the works of nature. Among these the celebrated Table Rock stands pre-eminent. I shall here aftempt to give you some faint idea of it, although I am well aware, that any description whatever must fail in impressing you with those sublime conceptions, which are only to be derived from an actual inspection of the object itself.

The Table Rock is situated on the top of Table Mountain, in the North-Eastern extremity of Pendleton District, and within two or three miles of the North-Carolina line. It is composed of Granite and Gneiss. It derives its name from the sup posed resemblance it has to a table. I have been led to suppose that it was part of the Blue Ridge, but nature, as if pleas Cave" ranks first. It would, perhaps ed with her wonderful production, has set for its locality, as separates it not only from every other mountain, but from all objects which would draw from it the particular attention of the astonished visitant. It is bounded on the North by the South fork of the Saluda river, which divides it from the Blue Ridge-South by the Oolenoi Creek, which separates it from the Eastatoe Mountains; but these streams extremity of its base-

The guide shews two views, one from the base of the rock, the other from the summit. We visited the former on Thurs day, ascending the mountain about a mile and a half to the " Horse rack," and as the remainder of the way was inaccessible to a horse, we walked, or rather climbed, and scrambled, until we found ourselves at the foot of the celebrated "Lover's Leap," for so is called the great perpendicular front. Ramsay, the Historian of South-Carolina, describes it finely in less than a dozen words, viz :- " a vast wall stretching up to Heaven." This immense perpendicular, as near as we could estimate it by a glance of the eye, is a quarter of a mile in length, and its height is said to be upwards of eleven hundred feet.* This, and the valley adjacent, open a wide field for geological speculation. A gentleman of our party, who examined one of the huge masses of rock, with which the valley abounds, and compared it as to shape, colour and kind, with a corresponding fissure in the rock above, was of opinion, that it had been precipitated from that place. Whether this would prove that all the other masses of rock in the valley were likewise attached to that flat surface, is hazarding too much to say. In fact it would be difficult, on this hypothesis, to account for its perpendicular formation. No traces of " the bones of animals which had incantinusly ventured too near its brink,"t were discovered. We were prevented from making further observations by a heavy shower of rain, from which we sheltered ourselves by entering a "rock house," the general name for ail rocky cavities. After the rain had abated, we remounted our horses, and rode to our

The next day we set out on a new rout to view the summit, to which an expert horseman may ride; our livrses, however, which had been always accustomed to a flat country, laboured so excessively, that we judged it most proper to leave them, and work our way up on foot, which we I had ever reached so giddy a height, I astonishment. From this point such a variety of interesting objects force themselves on the attention, that the mind, as if too limited to grasp the whole prospect, flies incessantly from one object to another, instinctively giving vent, in hurried interjections, to the ideas which crowd upon it. thrown aside; we still behold, in imagination, the farms-the distant fails-the craggy steeps-the wavering bed of green property of the University. -the mountain's feathered side-the dreadabyss below.

Near this spot we observed several indentations on the rock, apparently the track of a horse, one in particular, was so well defined that the whole impression of the frog was visible. Concerning these marks there is an Indian tradition, accounting for them in the following manner. At a period anterior to any white settlement in this remote corner, the Great Spirit descended to the top of the rock, mounted on a beautiful white horse, and the tracks were afterwards shewn in confirmation of the story.

Another curiosity which is much more remarkable, is the "Wheel Track," though it bears no resemblance to any such impression. It consists of two parallel lines extending probably more than one hundred yards along the declivity of the rock and appears like the track, that you might suppose to be made by the claws and feet of a terrapin on a sea barch, except that the prints are nearer together, than if that |ed, or suspended, according to the discretion of had been the case.

I would mention the "Moss Carpet" with which many portions of the surface of the summit is covered. It is composed of a vegetable substance, so firmly faculty. matted together, that several square yards may be raised from the Rock, without its falling asunder.

Among other remarkable objects are shewn to the traveller, "Granny Hooper's command but little attention, but for the it in bold relief, by selecting such a spot singular story with which it is connected and which possesses all the interest of a romance, without its fictitious accompaniments. The substance of the tale as related by our guide, I will briefly record.

An obscure individual whose name was Hooper, together with his wife and children, resided somewhere in the neighborhood of the Rock, on the banks of the Saluda river. Hooper was a most determined Whig, but during that period of the Revolution, when war had not yet made its way into the western wilderness, he mained an idle spectator. His patriotic spirit, however, could not withstand the temptation of taking a more decided part when the bloody struggle had at length reached his threshold. He espoused his country's cause with a degree of energy that soon rendered him conspicuous. Un fortunately he did not live to see the ter mination of the war. He was surprised, and taken at his own house, after a desperate resistance, by a party of Tories, to whom he was particularly obnoxious. After burning his dwelling, the barbarous wretches immediately executed the sentence of death upon him, by forcing a bayonet through his jaw, and in that shocking manner, he expired in his wife's presence ! The horrible scene deprived the miserable woman of her reason, and in this state of mental decrepitude, she formed the singular resolution of secluding herself from all human society, and accordingly sought an asylum in the cave which now bears her name. Here she lived for years, partly supported by the charities of the neighbors and partly by the sale of pink root, and other medicinal plants, which she collected on the side of the mountain. The infirmities of age at last compelled her to move down the river, among her friends, where pantaloons and waistcoat : In the winter it shall she shortly after died. When I entered the cave, whose blackened walls bore testimony to the numerous fires that had blazed there in other times, I could not help feeling a degree of sympathy for the mistortunes of the individual, who was driven from her fireside and children, to take up her residence in this gloomy cavern.

Yours, J. C.
