Extracts from the North American Review.] "Mr. Pitkin well abserves in his Preface to the History of the United States. that no complete history of the British Colonies in America can be written, without consulting the manuscript papers in the offices of the English Governmen fact, it would be an absolute waste of time in any person to engage in such an unilerhad this privilege, and he seemed to have used it effectually; but his work embraces a comparatively small part only of our colonial history, and that by no means the most attractive part. It was boped that Congress would take measures to procure copies of these papers, as both the States of Georgia and North-Carolina had made application to the General Government for this object, in reference to those States .the committee of Ways and Means, neary two years ago, reported a bill recommending such a measure, and making provision for procuring copies of all the papers in the English offices, relating to the colonial history of this country. The bull, however, was never heard of more, and lay undisturbed upon the table, till it was swept away amidst the rubbish of forgo ten things.
