CULTIVATION OF THE GRAPE.

Extract of a letter from N. Herbenont, Esq., to a friend in Baltimore, dated August 12th, 1829.

According to your desire, I shall give you a few hints on the subject of the culture of the vine, suggested by my experience. The frost is, as you express it, our great enemy; but there are several others, which we have to give constant battle to, if we hope to conquer them. They are—birds, insects of various kinds, and too much rain in summer. However difficult it may be to conquer them all, the frost and rain present the greatest difficulty.— Any one who undertakes the cultivation of the vine on a large scale, must make up his mind to meet with frequent disappointments. He must know that the produce of the vine is every where precarious, more or less according to circumstances of climate and soil; and also according to the destruction of its enemies. On the other hand it is perfectly true, that the crop is sometimes large beyond all anticipation; so that if a vigneron should make but one crop in three years, still his average profit would far exceed that produced by any other culture usual with us. For this reason, and others very obvious, it is a matter of no small consequence, to select well the particular kinds of grapes, which yield the best wine, and in the greatest quantity, and those which are least subject to rot and to other casualties; also to make a judicious selection of soil, and particularly of situation. The experiments necessary to make a good selection, are very expensive, and require many years to be perfected. Happy is he, in this as in most other respects, who can avail himself of the experience of others. As to situation the same instructions given 2000 years ago, are still the best, viz: a high, dry, airy spot, with a deep light soil sandy, gravelly, or calcareous; but sufficiently loose for the roots to strike deep in search of moisture, and enable the vine to resist our great heat, and long droughts. The side of a hill is chiefly recommended; but on account of the very heavy rains to which we are liable in summer, I would not select a steep hill side, lest the soil be soon washed down.
The exposition also requires consideration.
That which is least liable to be affected by later frost, is to be preferred. A good mark is where a peach orchard never fails producing fruit. There are spots where fruit trees never fail of bearing, a plentiful crop, such cannot be purchased at too high a price for a vineyard; for then a failure would scarcely happen. If my vineyard were secure from late frosts, and my Madeira grape never to rot, or to rot slightly I would not exchange it for a sugar plantation. And there are situations where it never rots, particularly when trained high, the bearing part running on a trellis, placed horizontally about seven or eight feet high.

I have hitherto preferred planting cuttings early, that is, in November or December; I have also succeeded very well in March and April, when the cuttings had not pushed out their buds too much; but not so well in the intermediate time.— Any mode by which the cuttings could be kept alive without growing, until the danger of the frost is past, would secure the growth of almost every cutting. For this purpose I would suggest to those who can conveniently do it, to keep their cuttings in an ice-house. They ought to be put in barrels or boxes, buried upright in clean sand, leaving one or two buds out. I have not had the possibility of trying this experiment; but am almost fully satisfied, that cuttings kept so cold as not to vegetate, moist enough to keep them alive, in clean sand to prevent their growing mouldy, but not so wet as to rot them, (of which there can be little danger in an ice-house,) may be planted or grafted late in April, or even in May, without losing one in twenty.— This would save a great deal of trouble, as it is very useful, when cuttings are planted or grafted earlier, to cover them entirely with earth to keep the frost from the bud, and when the danger is over, take off gently the earth which had been thus drawn up.— This must be done very carefully for fear of breaking off the buds, which have then begun to shoot. I usually plant my vines in rows about ten feet apart, and seven or eight feet in the rows, planting two cuttings in each place, the tops close together, and the bottoms as far apart as convenient. If both take, I transplant one, when two years old in a missing place. A good way also is to prepare a piece of ground by manuring and deep digging, and plant the cuttings in nursery, in rows 2 or 3 feet apart, and 6 to 8 inches in the rows. In this case it is best not to plant them so deep, as when they are to remain. Eight or ten inches is deep enough, and they take root better than when planted deeper. Ground that has been well manured and cultivated the preceding year or two in potatoes, is well prepared for a nursery. When the vines are 2 or 3 years old, transplant them where they are to remain, taking care to have the holes dug first, and to take up only a few vines at a time, that the roots may not be long exposed to the air or sun. By digging them up with all their roots uncut, and planting them very carefully, a foot deep, in holes at least two feet deep, and half filled up with good mellow earth. The vines will all take and hardly suffer at all by the removal. To propagate the vine speedily and effectually I would recommend grafting to those who have stock fit for the purpose. In the country wild vines of any kind will do very well—even in the woods.

Cleft grafting in the root, a few inches below the surface, is the most convenient way; but when the stock is too large to the cleft, saw it off horizontally, and with a gimlet make one or two holes in the stock about 1 1/2 inch deep, then take the scion, cut through the bark, and as much of the wood as may be necessary to fit it to the hole, and drive it in; then with a little well mixt clay cover the stock, and about an inch of the graft, and cover the whole with earth, leaving only one bud above the ground.

The vine will bear grafting without joining the bark of the scion with that of the stock—the graft will grow with the utmost vigour, and frequently produce fruit the first year. They will at all events produce a number of fine cuttings the next winter. I have also succeeded well in making layers from side shoots, that grow very strongly near the ground, from the graft, laying them when green, in the summer following the grafting, and separating and transplanting the following spring. I have also dug up wild vines in the woods, even after they had begun to grow—in April when they had leaves on; grafted on them, and planted them carefully. I have now several of them grafted thus last April, that have ripe fruit. It is therefore advisable never to root up a vigorous vine because it does not bear good but to keep them for grafting. I grafted last spring two or three hundred Madeira scions in the roofs of the I-abella, (which is nearly worthless here,) and these grafts are now, many of them, with fruit on them, from twelve to twenty and even thirty feet long, and proportionably thick.

This Madeira, also called Warren, is the most valuable grape that has yet come to my notice. It is certainly the greatest bearer, and makes the best wine of any I have tried. It is also the most juicy, and is as rich as any I know. Its only fault is, as observed above, that some seasons, this is only one for instance, it rots a good deal.
I have however, some old vines of it that do not rot, and others that are perfectly sound three years out of four. N. H.

* Might not the trouble of the uncovering be avoided, by using covering of so light a nature, that the shoot would easily pass through it?

† There is a gentleman in this city who raises a considerable number of vines every year in nursery, some in beds prepared for the purpose —the plants nine inches apart each way; and others in boxes and tubs, made by cutting flour barrels in two, eight or ten cuttings in each.
They may be transplanted from these without a fibre being injured. The cuttings he uses are very short—frequently with a single eye. They require, however, to be watered, if the weather is not seasonable. Ed.
