The following is an interesting extract "Sir Walter Scutt's Auto-Biography :-laught to have mentioned, that, since v fourteenth or fifteenth year, my health, ignally delicate, had become extremely best. From infaocy I had labored un ter the infirmity of a severe lameness, bu I believe is usually the case with men spirit who suffer under personal inconveniences of this nature, I had, since the improvement of my health, in defiance i this incapacitating circumstance, dis nguished myself by the endurance of toil on foot or horseback, having often waik-d mirty miles a day, and rode upwards of a hundred, without stopping. In this manmer I made many pleasant journeys through wirts of the country then not very accessible, grined more amusement and instruc tion than I have been able to acquire since Thave travelled in a more commodious manner. I practised most sylvan sports. also, with some success, and with great delight. But these pleasures must have all resigned, or used with great mod eration, had I determined to regain my tition at the bar. It was even doubtful whether I could, with perfect character as jurisconsult, retain a situ tian in a volunver corps of cavalry, which I then held .-The threats of invasion were at this time instant and menacing ; the call by Britain on her children was universal, and was anwered by many, who, like my-elf, consuit d rather their will than their ability to bear arms. My services, however, were found useful in assisting to maintain the discipline of the corps, being the point ou which their constitution rendered them most amenable to military criticism. It other respects the squadron was a five one, consisting of handsome men, well mounted and armed at their own expense. My altention to the corps took up a good deal of time ; and while it occupied many of the happiest hours of my life, it luraished an additional reason for my reluctance again to encounter the severe course of study in dispensable to success in the juridical proession. On the other hand, my father, whose feelings might have been hurt by my quitting the bar, had been for two or three years dead ; so that I had no control t hwart my own inclination ; and my its come being equal to all the comforts, and some of the elegancies of life, I was no pressed to an irksome labor by necessity. that most powerful of motives; consequently, I was the more easily seduced to choose the employment which was most agreeable. This was yet the easier, that in 1800 I had obtained the preferment of Sheriff of Seikirkshire, about $00% a year a value, and which was the more agreeshe to me, as in that county I had seven frends and relations. But I did not bandon the profession to which I had been educated, without certain prudential ressittians, which, at the risk of some egotism, will liere mention ; not without the hope that they may be useful to young persons who may stand in circumstances shuttar to those in which I then stood. In the first place, upon considering the lives and lortunes of persons who have given themselves up to literature, or to the task of pleasing the public, it seemed to me that the circumstances which chiefly affected their happine-s and character were those from which Horace has bestowed upon authors the epithet of the irritable race. It

My second resolution was a corollary from the first-I determined that, without shatting my ears to the voice of true criticism, I would pay no regard to hat which assumes the form of satire. I therefore resolved to arm myself with the triple brass of Horace, against all the roving warfare of satire, parody, and sarcasin; to laugh if the jest was a good one ; or, i otherwise, to let it hum and buzz itself to sleep. It is to the observance of these rules (according to my best belief.) that, after a life of thirty years engaged in literary labors of various kinds, I attribute ny never having been entangled in any literary quarrel or continversy; and, which is a more pleasing result, hat I have been distinguished by the personal friendship of my most approved contemporaries of all parties. I adopted, at the sam time, another resolution, on which it may doubtless be remarked, that it was well for me that I had it in my power to do so, and that, therefore, it is a line of conduct which can

NEW PELHAM NOVEL. PAUL CLIFFORD.

A Novel. in two Volumes. BY MR. BULWER.

" Paul Clifford is perhaps the most original of all Mr. Bulwer's works, and can not fail to add largely to its writer's reputation. For the man of the world, it contains shrewdness and satire; for the muralist, matter of deep thought, and for the young, all the interest of narrative and all the poetry of feeling " Just received by J.
