MISCELLANEOUS.

"What a very tedious, long day it has been!" exclaimed Jane Carly, as she languidly seated herself on the sofa, and drew her beautiful white hand over her face, to conceal a yawn she could not overcome. "You are fatigued with your exertions, I presume," said her uncle Jacob, looking compassionately upon her. "Permit me to inquire what have been your employments during this long, tedious day?" "Employments?" repeated the young lady, coloring. "Oh, for that matter, uncle, I cannot remember all I have done."

"But you can enumerate some things, no doubt. Have you walked, or rode, or read, or worked?" "I detest walking when the wind is so high, and the streets so dusty. Why, no lady of fashion would be seen abroad to-day, uncle," replied Jane with great vivacity.

"And so, of course, I may conclude you have neither walked nor rode," observed uncle Jacob, as he very composedly put on his spectacles, and surveyed his niece through them, with an air as deliberate as a fop levels his eye glass in the theatre. Jane, however, shrunk more from her uncle's scrutiny than she would have done from the fop's. "Well, reading and working may be performed when the wind is high and the streets dusty."

Jane was silent, for reading came next in course, and she was too well acquainted with her uncle to attempt to impose on him by pretending to have read books which she knew only by their titles, or the reviews. Some young ladies may think Jane very conscientious. They see no harm in palming off a little of that smattering of knowledge which they gain by mingling in society, as their own. Why could not Jane have named some book which the old gentleman never heard of, and then, if she did mistake names, misapply characters, and misquote sentiments, he would never have detected her? Many a young lady has thus rattled away, to her own great delight and fancied importance, when with those whom she deemed could not readily discover she was ignorant whether the authors she so familiarly named wrote in prose or poetry, or whether the book she pretended so lately to have read, was a sermon or a song.

The truth is, Jane read nothing but novels; and as she had, only one week previous, solemnly promised her uncle not to touch a work of fiction for a month, she did not dare to acknowledge she had passed the whole of the forenoon poring over "A Marriage in High Life." She would as soon have confessed she had spent the hours planning when her own marriage was to be.

"Have you read Heber's Travels yet?" resumed uncle Jacob, attempting by a question to oblige his niece to converse. "No—not all—not much," returned Jane, speaking very quick. "I am not interested in it, uncle. I always hated a diary. It looks so methodical and mechanical. I think no author can be so particular, without having, in all his actions and speeches, reference to the note book. Can thoughts be free when one is subjected to the trammels of entering them all on the diary, as regularly as a merchant would his accounts? I would not, for the universe, undertake to be thus particular, and I always pity the writers of such minute facts too much to enjoy the information their labors would otherwise afford me."

"But there is one care that frequently oppresses you, which the good bishop seldom if ever appears to have felt. He never had to endure a very tedious, long day," said uncle Jacob, smiling. "Will keeping a diary always preserve us from ennui?" demanded Jane.

"The endeavor to have something worthy to record, would preserve us, my dear. The industrious and the studious seldom complain of a very tedious, long day." "Now I shall hear that saying of mine for this whole season, I presume," replied the laughable girl, as she took her uncle's hand, and affectionately pressed it between both hers. "Yet I said it merely because I did not at the moment think of any observation more wise. I forgot how very circumspect it was necessary to be."

"When conversing with your old-fashioned friend," interrupted her uncle. "Well, well, I forgive you, and if I loved you less I should be more indulgent to your little foibles. But, Jane, in this age of energy and improvement, nothing strikes me more unpleasantly, except gross vice, than to see young persons idle, and to hear their listless complaints of the tediousness of time. I can very well believe that the days must be tedious and long to those of your sex, excluded as you are from the business and bustle of the world, who have no literary resources. But now, when women are willing, not only to allow you to employ them, the woman who wastes her time in frivolous pursuits, or fashionable amusements—and such people are those who oftenest complain of very tedious, long days—deserves to be despised and laughed at."

A CHARACTER.

To describe Charley Wynox efficiently, there must be a new language, certainly, a new set of epithets. String and compound all that are now in use as you will, it will not do. Who can describe the varied deformities of that unearthly countenance, yet all conspiring to the strangest effect the countenance of man can produce? Those eyes, set there as practical stairs upon the organ—glaring, small, and red, as if they had been just pierced with a hot iron; a complexion burnt, adust, and adorned with perforations like those of a nutmeg-grater—a nose flattened to his face, and only distinguishable by two immense craters—a mouth forming an impassable gulf from the lower to the higher regions of his face—a combination and a form, indeed, in which every infernal power seemed to have set its seal, to give the world assurance—I need not say of a man! His tricks also were as whimsical as those of the hideous animal he most resembled. Eternally grinning, he attempted every species of joke, some good, others execrable, talking a kind of inarticulate gabble unadorned with words; for those who were not habituated to him could not understand one word he uttered. He was considered a privileged being; being exempted, by universal consent, from the strict rules of etiquette; for his nonsense, which seemed to flow from the unsweeting gladness of a good heart, never excited more than a transient frown, which soon relaxed, as if half applauding what it half condemned. But never did countenance do less justice to the virtues of a human character than Wynox's. Poor fellow! no self-sacrifice, no task however laborious, would he shrink from, to do an act of kindness—to comfort another in sickness, to relieve him with his purse if he was poor—that pursue a too faithless interpreter to his heart. He had little to bestow but good-will and active service. Self, the centre of the system in others, was in him quite dethroned. He devoted himself to the navy, a service he intensely admired. Captains, commanders, lieutenants, even the humble midddy, filled his house and his bungalow. The naval officer who casts his eye over these imperfect sketches, if he chanced to have been at that time on the India station, will recall the remembrance of Charley Wynox with a sigh. In their turn, they gave him invigorating cruises at sea, which helped to repair from time to time his shattered constitution. Could it be imagined that this rough-hewn copy of humanity was destined to feel the pangs of love? It was the only part of the passion he could be expected to feel. But he did love with fervency and idolatry, and he was for more than a year sickled o'er with the pale cast of a lover's thought—and he told his love, but, as he himself used to remark, it was with a misgiving that marred all that he had conned over for the occasion. It was a beautiful creature whom he served; and it was a thousand pities that he made the proposal, for she was truly amiable, and would not willingly have wounded any sentient thing. She comprehended the nature of his visit, and guessed the purport of what he was stammering out, elated, and ran out of the room. "You may go farther and fare worse," cried Charley, as the lady left him. She heard it, and laughed still louder. It was too ridiculous even for the lover, for he joined in her mirth most audibly, and then stepped into his palanquin. In those iron times at Madras, Wynox, as usual, said what he pleased. But his idle talk was not forgiven by the starch and austere man of authority. Nothing was too high or too mean for his resentment. Poor Charley was removed from his place. He embarked for England to obtain redress, but in vain; returned to Madras, and died in indigence. They ascribe an anecdote to Wynox which is highly characteristic of him. When he first arrived in India, and delivered his letters of recommendation round the settlement, he carried one to O——, an old and choleric member of the Council. This man was peculiarly splenetic at these introductions, and generally discharged his spleen upon the persons in England who took the liberty of writing them, not sparing occasionally the young gentleman who was obtruded on his patronage. And pray sir, said he to Charley, as he glanced over the letter, what is your father? My father, replied Wynox, is a farmer. And why, returned the other, did he not make you a farmer also? Poor Wynox was stung with the reproach, but with admirable quickness asked him—And who, Mr. O——, was your father? My father!—My father, sir, said the counsellor—my father was a gentleman! Then let me ask, said Wynox, why he did not make you a gentleman also?

HARD TIMES.

The following will be about half read, and the author will be termed a novice, and yet it contains truths, lamentable truths:

It is a fact that nine-tenths of the young men, by some means, have come to the conclusion, that it is degrading to till the soil, or perform any sort of manual labor for a livelihood; they seem to entertain the idea that they possess intuitively the skill of the Lawyer, the Physician, the Clergyman, the Merchant or the Author; that they have nothing to do but to hie themselves to New-York, Boston, or some other city, as soon as they are fairly flegged and can be trusted out of their mother's apron string, and that their superlative talents will at once bring them into notice. With these views, many a young man, who might have made a most excellent farmer or mechanic, leaves his home, is gone two or three years, expends perhaps, half his kind father's fortune, which he had labored hard to amass, and returns a poor lazy, idle blockhead, complaining of hard times. This is the case often, very often. If all those young men who have been born and bred to that most honorable of all employments, tillers of the soil, would attend to that business instead of gadding off, and attempting to become contemptible coxcombs, we should seldom hear of hard times."

Female Academy.

It is a high, healthy, and wealthy section of country. The buildings are large, commodious, and in good repair, and well adapted to the purposes for which they were designed; or they might be converted into a desirable private residence for a large family. A more minute description is deemed superfluous, as it is presumed that none would purchase, without viewing the premises. The furniture belonging to the Establishment will also be disposed of, should the property not be sold before the 1st day of December next, it will on that day be offered at public sale on the premises, when those desirous of engaging in this line of business would do well to attend, as it is seldom that such an opportunity as the present is afforded.

The Terms which shall be liberal, and such as to accommodate purchasers, will be made known on the day of sale.

Letters on the subject addressed to the subscriber, postage paid, will be promptly attended to.
