HORFORS OF THE GUILLOTINE.

In the south, toward the close of the last September, the following circumstances occurred-I think it was at Pamiers :- The officers went to a man in prison, whom they found quietly playing at cards, and gave him for 1840. notice that he was to die in two hours. The wretched creature was horror-struck; for, during the six months that he had been forgotten, he had no longer thought on death? he was confessed, bound, his frair cut off, he was placed in the fatal cart, and taken to the place of execution : the executioner took him from the priest, laid him down and bound him on the guillotine, and then let loose the axe. The triangle of iron slowly detached itself, falling by jerks down the side, until, horrible to relate, it wounded the man without killing him! The poor creature uttered a frightful cry: The disconcerted executioner hauled up the axe, and let it slide down again. A second time the neck of the malefactor was wounded, without being severed. the executioner raised the axe a third time. but no better effect attended a third stroke.

Let me abridge these fearful details. Five times the axe was raised and let fall, and after the fifth stroke the condemned was still shricking for mercy. The indignant populace commenced throwing missiles at the guillotine, and crept away behind the gend- Tax 96 cents. armes' horses; but I have not yet finished. The hapless culprit seeing that he was left alone on the scaffold, raised up on the plank, and there standing, frightful, streaming with blood, demanded with feeble cries that some one should unbind him! the poplace full of pity, were on the point of forcing the gendarmes to help the hapless wretch who had five times undergone his sentence. At this moment a servant of the executioner, a youth under twenty, mounted on the scaffold, told the sufferer to turn round that he might unbind him, then taking the advantage of the posture of the dying man, who had yielded himself without any mistrust, sprang on him, and slowly cut through the neck with a knife. All this happened, all this was seen. According to law, a judge was obliged to be present at this execution. By a sign he could have stopped ail. Why was he leaning back in his carriage then, this man, while they massacred another man? What was he doing, this punisher of assassins, while fellow creature? And the judge was not tried for this; nor was the executioner tried for it; and no tribunal inquired into this monstrons violation of all law on one of God's creatures.

barity in the eriminal code, under Richelieu, under Christopher Fouquet. Monsieur de-Chalais was put to death at Nantes, by an awkward soldier, who, instead of a sword stroke, gave him thirty-four strokes of a cooper's adze. But at least it was considered execrable by the parliament of Paris: there was an inquest and a trial; and, altho Richelien and Fougnet did not suffer, the soldier was punished. An injustice, doub . less, but in which there was some show of justice. In the modern instance, nothing was done; the fact took place after July, in times of civilization and march of intellect, a year after the celebrated lamentation of the chamber on the penalty of death. The circumstance attracted no attention; the Paris papers published it as an anecdote, and no one cared about it. It was only known that the guillotine had been put out of order by dismissed servant of the executioner who, to revenge himself, had taken this mode of action. - Another instance. At Dijon, only three months ago, they brought to the scat-fold a woman. (A woman!). This time a-g in the age of the guillotine failed of effect, and the head was not quite detached. Then the executioner's servant pulled the feet of the woman, and, amid the veils of the popu-

In the seventh century, that epoch of bar-lace, thus finished the law. At Paris, we have come of the secret executions; since July, they no longer dare to decapitate in the town, for they are afraid. Here is what they do-They took lately from the Bicetre prison, a man, under sentence of death named Desandrieux, I think-they put him in a sort of pannier on two wheels, closed on every side. bolted and padlocked; and then with a gendarme in front, and another at the back, without noise or crowd, they proceeded to the deserted barrier of St. James. It was in the morning when they arrived, with but little light. There was a newly erected guillotine. and for spectators, some dozens of little boy's grouped upon the heaps of stones around the unexpected machine. Quickly they withdrew the man from the basket; and without giving him time to breathe, they furtively. secretly deprived, him of life ! And this is called a public and solome act of high justice ! Infamous derision ! How, then, do the law-givers understand the word civilization? To what point have we attained?-17 was greatly to be feared, since they put an end to him in this traitorous fashion! Let us te just, however, the execution was not quite secret. In the morning, people hawked and sold, as usual, the sentence of death through the streets. It appears there are people who have lived by such sales. The crime of a hapless fellow creature, his pun-Advertisements, inserted in the Semi-Weekly Ruo- ishment his torture, his agony, form their stock in trade, in paper that they sell for a penny. Can one conceive any thing more hideous than this coin verdigrised in blood?
