AND THE MYSTERIOUS BEAUTY. When Bonaparte was created First Consal for life, his court was similar to that of a king. Ancient customs were revived, and the code of etiquette was as rigid as a hunred years before. As the Jonsul found hat the Palace of the Tuileries was but a dull ojourn, he spent most of his leisure time at almaison, although it was somewhat too mall for the etalage of power. Seeing this, e took possession of the Palace of St.Cloud, which he had refused to accept when previously offered to him saying-" I shall take nothing from the people"-a promise which e forgot as soon as he overcame the first ifficulties of his career.

Mr. Gaudin, prime minister, was it is said was soon followed, and the lace and silk tockings replaced the sword and the boots. Sonaparte himself, at an assembly at Lyons, with red silk, and all the Englishmen attend- ble scite of the buildings attached to the Academy.

"I don't wish to be compared to Cromwell," said Bonaparte, shutting the book .---" Am I like the protector, a hypocrite, a fanatic, the murderer of a monarch ? But truce to this, come to mass on Sunday next, and you shall see a beautiful creature · I will point her out to you ; and she will sit at the fourth gallery window on the right. You must follow her to her abode, and tell me afterward where it is-Allons."
