THE GOVERNESS.

Nothing particular occurred, until an hour before tea time,—orders were sent up to have the children dressed, and sent below. The tea bell did not ring. The water came into the nursery, bearing Miss R's tea. Josephine looked astonished. 'Why do you bring my tea up?' said she, to the waiter.

'I assure you, madam,' said Miss P. 'nothing but a promise which I deem sacred, would ever sever me from this charming and interesting little flock,' looking around upon the children. Flattery to a mother's ears, she knew was just the thing at this crisis.

ded against, it but turns, assumes another form, and dwells and reigns in the heart still. None can know how 'deceitful above all things' the heart is, until they strive to root out its errors; then by its powerful opposition they will learn how totally averse to it is to submit to the will of God.
