LONG EVENINGS.

At a little past five o'clock, the glorious king of day, with radiant light and heat, drops beneath the western horizon, to carry the morning signal to the sleeping millions of other climes-to shed his genial warmth on other soils-to quicken the gems in other fields-ripen the waving grain of other mountains-adorn other vales with the luxuries of earth-to cheer the hopes and enliven the spirits of other countries-and crown the labors of ther Nations with peace and plenty, while here the shades of gloomy night o'er hang the " pale nature's face"-the chilling winds of Autumn benumb our limbs-twilight dews in icy crystals o'erload each leaf and branch, and Father, Mother, Brother and Sister are clustering around the old kitchen fire, to while away their evening hours, alas! too often in thoughtless reverie or useless meditation.

What a glorious opportunity is thus furnings, to expand our thoughts and fill up the waste places in the store house of mind with solid and useful knowledge! How could the farmer, whose thoughts at ev e are necessarily withdrawn from his proper employment of the day, be better privileged to improve and discipline the powers and faculties of his mind and the minds of his family, than when seated in the stillness of night with his family around his own fireside, possessed of all the pleasures, the comforts and the quietudes of the domestic circle and domestic happi-

There is a choice season for mental culture. Generally there is little else to engross the attention of the farmer. He feels no painful anxiety about the safety of his crops; they are all grown, gathered and secure-his sustenance for winter is certain. The frosts have shut out his plough from the earth. He does not sit silently down at night to calculate where, for what purposes, and with what team he shall till the soil te-morrow. He does not stop at this season of the year to meditate the improvements and conveniences he might gather around him, nor to suggest what seed might yield the most abundant harvest if sown in a particular field. All these and kindred considerations are reserved for the opening of the spring, when all nature teems with new life, and inspires fresh hopes of abundance. The silence of the night pervades his habitation within, and the bustle and tumults of business are suspended without. No noise is head to interrupt his meditations No new objects dart before his vision to arrest the current of his thoughts. No chain of reasoning is broken or unfinished by surrounding confusion. Then, again, the sultriness of summer, so fruitful of slothfulness and stupidity, is past and gone-the melting heat of a vertical sun has now given place to the pure and exhilerating atmosphere of autumn. The mind feels stimulated by the change-it feels its impulses quickened-its perceptions sharpened-its understanding enlarged-its reflections more penetrating-its reach more extended-its grasp more comprehensive, and its every faculty abundantly refreshed with new vigor.

What season then can be more admirably calculated to promote the acquisition of pure knowledge than that which secures the assistance of so many favorable circumstances, or what time is more apppropriate to open the pages of history-"the mirror of the world"-and trace the rise and progress of society, the origin of Nations, the building of magnificent temples and palaces, lofty towers and monuments and mighty cities?-What is more interesting than to behold thro' this mirror the generations of men come and go-the downfall of Empires and Kingdoms! to see nation contending with nation, armies clashing with armies, and see whole regiments cut down by the sword as by the power of ish of Orange, once owned her and she may have gone in advance) Seventy-five dollars.

What we say can be down of tornadoes ? What we sav, can be more interesting or more important to man than to trace these phenomena in their minu-tia of detail and variation of circumstance with their several causes and effects?

But perhaps not less important or less in-structive are the biography of distinguished men, who have been the most conspicuous and most successful in bringing about many of these events; por is any time more convenient for biographical reading than that which combines all the advantages which we have hithertofore enumerated.
