A THRILLING AND FRIGHTFUL DETAIL OF A TRAGEDY IN RUSSIA.

We have received from Moscow, the subjoined details of a horrible event, which show what the condition of the serfs continue to be in Russia.

M. Mierzloff, a young Lieut. of the St. Petersburg Regiment of cuirassiers, 22 years of age, inherited, early in the first of this year, by the death of his uncle, a large fortune, consisting of lordships and property situated in the government of Tambow. Eager to enjoy his fortune, the young lieutenant immediately resigned his commission, and took leave of his fellow officers, promising to see them again, and settled in the village of Sokolin-Slaw, the pleasantest and best situated of the many which had just become his own property.

From that moment young Mierzloff, with all the warmth of youth, entered upon the life of a Russian Lord, the owner of 2,000 souls, that is to say, 2,000 peasants, half of whom usually consisted of young girls, to whom it is true, the Imperial ukases deny the possession of a soul, but who are not the less among the worldly goods of a lord and master of twenty-two, those, perhaps, he sets the highest value on.

Mierzloff, like men of his birth and fortune, led in his chateau of Sokolin-Slaw, the most dissolute and licentious life, when in the month of July the feite day of his reverend patron, Saint Alexis, approaching, he invited twelve old comrades of his regiment of St. Petersburg, to come and celebrate it with him. The officers, whose corps were transiently stationed a short distance, hastened to comply with the invitation on the 17th of the month, the holy patron's day; the morning commenced with a grand breakfast, brilliant caucade, pistol and gun shooting, and above all, a copious consumption of champagne. At the dinner, which displayed oriental magnificence, and every course of which was brought by young girls singing in chorus their native airs, what sense the light brains of the Lord of Sokolin-Slaw and of his comrades still yielded entirely vanished. At the dessert the male servants were dismissed, and Mierzloff, declaring his wish to do the honors of all he had to his former comrades, urged them to choose among the chorus of young singers such as pleased them.

Accustomed from the cradle to blind obedience, and quite certain of obtaining neither protection nor defence among the serfs of Sokolin-Slaw, the poor girls on whom the chance of the officers fell submitted to their fate, save one, named Maryna, perhaps the handsomest of them, who availing herself of a moment when the doors were not yet closed, took to flight and hustened towards the country.

As soon as he heard of her escape, Mierzloff roared out, "Kej'van, Alexis!—hasten in pursuit of Maryna—let her be brought back forthwith!"

Of the two men whom he gave this order to, one was Maryna's brother, and the other was betrothed to her! And yet they obeyed with the blind ardor of the hound in the pursuit of the flying game, and before many minutes had elapsed they brought back the trembling and weeping Maryna to her master, whom, in their superstitious credulity, they deemed at liberty to dispose, not only of their lives and mortal remains, but also of their souls.

The moment Maryna was brought up, she was as well as her companions magnificently dressed, and covered with flowers and trinkets; and when evening came on, one of those brutal orgies commenced with the Russian bores, in the semi-savage manners, called "Eden Suppers."

At midnight the music, songs, and drinking had subsided in the mansion; the serfs, whom their duty did not keep at their post, had dispersed in the village; among others, Kej'van and Alexis, Maryna's brother and lover, had retired to a public house, and indulged in copious draughts of grain brandy, both to dispel the painful thoughts that oppressed them, and to recruit their strength after the day's fatigue.

Meanwhile, in the most retired part of the Sokolin-Slaw residence, and whilst the lights were successively vanishing and fast making way for repose, a woman was on the watch, a prey to jealousy and fury. It was a young and handsome girl, named Maria, who had been a year past Mierzloff's favorite, and whom he had taken good care not to introduce to his guests, and above all, to keep away from the scenes by which he celebrated their visit. A slave, attached to the young woman, had, by her commands, watched all that had passed; she had thereby heard of Maryna's flight and return; and also that Mierzloff, fascinated by the young girl's beauty and resistance, had appropriated her to himself.

Resolved upon revenge, the jealous Maria sallied forth unperceived, sought in the village for Maryna's brother and lover, and found them, about midnight, in the aforesaid public-house. She reproached them with their infamy and cowardice, kindled in their breasts the feelings of revenge which she could not restrain, and succeeded in rousing them from their apathy, and inflaming them to such a degree that they dashed their glasses to the ground, and putting their forefingers together in the shape of a cross, swore to be avenged. After this oath, the most solemn a Muscovite boor can make, Kej'van & Alexis left Maria, and went to every house in the village, exciting their countrymen and telling their design.

About three hours after this scene, just at dawn when the inmates of the chateau were slumbering, a band of near four hundred peasants, each one carrying a large bundle of dry straw, spread round the residence, which like most of those in the district of Tambow, was built of wood. At a given signal, and before any within could give the alarm, the peasants set fire in all directions to the straw which they heaped up, close to the sides of the building, and then, retiring to some distance, they waited armed with guns, axes, pitchforks, and scythes, till the illumination routed the Lord of Sokolin-Slaw and his guests from their slumbers.

Mierzloff was the first disturbed. Terrified at the sight of the encircling fire, he rushed into the court, and attempted to make his way through the gate. A shot which brought him to the ground, taught him what fate awaited his guests. Those soon made their appearance sword in hand, and strove to open themselves a way through the flames, and the close ranks of the peasants. A tremendous struggle ensued, in which, however, the officers were fortunate enough to lose only one of their comrades, a captain named Draberg. Harassed with fatigue, having their hair and clothes burned, they succeeded in reaching a little wood, where, beyond the grasp of the peasants, they were enabled to give assistance to four of them who had been dangerously wounded.

The moment the peasants had seen their lord, all were aware that they would pursue the officers in vain; they rushed into the chateau to save the poor girls, the innocent victims of their master; as for the latter, after raising him, bathed in his blood, they gratified their long restrained hatred, and inflicted on him atrocious tortures, an immense wood pile was set fire to, and Mierzloff was cast into the furnace. In vain did Maria, repenting too late the revenge she kindled, implore in behalf of her unfortunate master, whom she believed was still alive; she was herself thrown into the fire, with reproaches of her having loved her oppressor.

This terrible execution being over, the peasants' fury raged against every thing that had belonged to the Lord of Sokolin-Slaw. The house was burned down, along with the stables, barns, and breweries; and lest any thing that Mierzloff liked should survive, they destroyed his horses and hounds.

Three days after this tragic occurrence, an inspecteur captain (the police chief of the district) arrived on the spot, commissioned to inquire into the affair. He was accompanied by two companies of infantry and cavalry, to enable him to quell the rebellion. His surprise may be imagined when, instead of having to deal with rebels he heard on his arrival, that the whole population of Sokolin-Slaw were congregated in the church, wherein twelve marriages were being solemnized between the twelve young victims of the lord's last orgies and the young men betrothed to them previous to the dreadful occurrence, the approbrium of which they thus hoped to obliterate.

The evidence of the murder and fire was palpable, and all the peasants confessed their guilt. Two hundred and eighty-three of them, including Kej'van and Alexis, were arrested and thrown into the Tomb of Prisons, where the criminal tribunal continued the investigation.

On the 12th of September, sentence was passed on the prisoners of Sokolin-Slaw. The 283, whether old or young, were indiscriminately condemned to receive each, one hundred stripes of the knout, and such as might survive the punishment, were to labor for life in the mines of Siberia. The Judges, nevertheless, after passing the sentence, dictated by the inflexibility of the law, addressed a petition to the Czar, wherein, after impartially submitting the whole affair, they implored of his wisdom and mercy a commutation of the penalty, or, at least, a mitigation of rigors they were doomed to. The Emperor, after consulting the Council of State, issued a ukase, in pursuance of which the whole population of Sokolin-Slaw was to be sent to the colonies of the Caucasus, where the men were to be incorporated with the regiments of Cossacks of the line.

The Imperial Ukase, which has been hailed with satisfaction and gratitude by all the enlightened men of Moscow, has, on the contrary, excited great discontent among the whole nobility, who cling to their privileges; so much so, that the governor of Moscow, General Nej-Hart, has ordered the decree to be carried into execution, without the usual publicity.—Gazette des Tribunaux, 9th of February 1842.

ROMANTIC STORY.

The Boston Times says "that some one lately attempted to murder a sleeping woman by pouring hot lead into her ear, and that so shocking a circumstance was never heard of before." This is a mistake. A more remarkable instance occurred some years ago, in Virginia. We personally knew all parties intimately. Col. F., a gentleman of high respectability and frequently a representative from his county, died leaving a wife, some sons, and a very beautiful daughter, about fifteen years of age. The widow, finding herself destitute, opened a boarding house at the county seat, and among her boarders was Mr. W., a wealthy merchant, in the meridian of life, and a very fine looking man. This gentleman was the prop and stay of the family, gave employment to the sons, furnished means to educate the daughter in the most fashionable manner, and conceived for her a violent passion. On her return from school, he addressed her, but she resisted alike his appeals and the importunities of her mother and friends. She had indeed, formed an attachment for a very nice young man in the same town, but he was not to be put in competition with the rich merchant, in the estimation of the family. The young lady, perhaps, thought otherwise. Finally, however, after two years of assiduity and delicate gallantry on the part of Mr. W. and the combined tears, entreaties, threats and persecution of the family, the fair girl stood before the altar and became his wife. The next evening a large party was given them, and in the midst of the dance Mr. W. being suddenly attacked with vertigo and sick headache, was compelled to withdraw. His young wife hung over him in the silent watches of night, apparently in deep distress and insisted on giving him a potion. She poured out a wine glass full of laudanum, and he swallowed it without knowing its nature. From some cause, it immediately acted as an emetic, but left him stupid and wandering. His senses reeled. One moment he would lay motionless and comatose as if on the borders of the spirit world, and then he would shrink and leap up convulsively like a strong man in his agony. Mrs. W. denied all admission into the chamber. At length he fell into a gentle slumber. She then stooped for a moment over the smoldering embers—approached the bed, gazed at her sleeping husband, and holding a heated ladle in her hand, calmly prepared to pour a stream of melted lead into his ear. At that instant he moved, and the hissing liquid intended to penetrate to, and scald out his brain, and thus cause death without a trace, fell upon his cheek. He shouted in excruciating pain, and the merry revellers, mother, brothers and friends, rushed in. There writhed the still stupid husband, the lead riveted deep in his cheek, and there stood the fiend wife, her bridal fillets yet upon her brow, the instrument of death in her hand and an empty phial labelled "Laudanum," lying on the floor. The fearful realities of the case flashed on every one, and in the confusion of the moment, she disappeared, and was hurried forthwith out of the Commonwealth to a distant State. On searching the room an old French Magazine was found containing the death-bed confession of a woman, who had murdered nine husbands by pouring lead in their ears. The laudanum and lead, it was ascertained, she had procured from the store of Mr. W., a few days before the marriage, and the ladle used was a part of the bridal present. The Grand Jury next morning found a bill against the fugitive, and the Legislature being in session, immediately decreed a final and absolute divorce. What renders this case the more singular is, that Miss T. was proverbial for the blaudness of her manner, and the uniform softness of her temper. She was a blond. The rose tinted her lily cheek as a sun beam glows on snow. Her blue eyes were indescribably sweet, and her golden hair floated like drapery of gossamer, around a form more perfect and voluptuous, than ever Raphael dreamed of or Petrarch sung. Often have we gazed, as she stood the cynosure of every circle, and wondered if angels could be so fair.

But the sequel of this romance is more singular still. Years rolled by and Mr. W. continued a wretched and solitary man. But the spell of the enchantress was still upon his soul. He closed his stores—sold out his estates—collected his ample means and followed her to her distant abode, to make a new offer of his hand! She had just married a man of high standing, aware of all the circumstances, but incapable of resisting her charms. Poor W! Then indeed, did the iron enter his soul. The deadly arrow quivered in his side. His early love—his fascinating courtesan—his triumph and the tragedy it occasioned—the flight, the divorce—his years of misery—the new birth of his passion and now its disappointment final and forever—came rushing over him like an avalanche, in the midst of bitter memories and painful sorrow, and he prayed for death! Whether this prayer was answered we know not. He may yet wander broken hearted over the earth; but one thing we do know: If he be dead, a more wretched, yet a purer and nobler spirit, never winged its flight to Heaven.

The better way.—The sons of the poor die rich—while the sons of the rich die poor. What an encouragement to toil through life in acquiring wealth to toil through life in acquiring wealth to ruin our children. Better to go with our money as we go along, educate our sons—secure their virtue by habits of industry and study, and let them take care of themselves.—Wist.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

THESE PILLS have now been more than eight years before the Public, and their just pretensions to the character claimed for them, have been tested and proved by a great number of persons, too intelligent to be deceived, and too deeply interested in the results not to observe with care, and judge without favor. Experience has not weakened these pretensions, but strengthened and confirmed them by a mass of testimony of such respectable character as has never sustained any article in this form in any country. The original design was to relieve Dyspepsia, and those functional derangements upon which it commonly depends. They were however found, by preserving the stomach and bowels in a healthy state of action, to tend greatly to ward off those bilious attacks to which many are liable, but not as an Anti-Bilious Pill, in the common signification of the term. Those, therefore, who expected in them an active purgative (though in many they are such), may have been disappointed; yet few instances of failure have been ascertained among those who have faithfully employed the article according to the design, where relief might reasonably have been expected. In addition to the habitual dyspeptic, those who from custom or from necessity, as in traveling or business, take their meals hastily, find in the use of these Pills great protection or relief, from consequent occasional attacks of indigestion; and, indeed, all whose habits or pursuits are sedentary, may find them with safety and benefit.

The chief objection urged against them is, that they encourage indolence in the pleasures of the table by the immunity they give from the painful effects of excess. That the public may feel assured that no imposition is attempted to be practised upon them, the Proprietor has obtained permission to refer to the following gentlemen, (among many others) who, from personal experience of the efficacy of these Pills, are willing to recommend them to their friends, viz:

Brandreth's Pills.—We have a fresh supply—We were about to say, of this valuable Medicine—but to those who have tried them, it is unnecessary to say so, and those who have not tried them would be slow perhaps to believe us. It is, however, a serious fact, that we could name at least one family, where their regular use for several years past, has made the Physicians' visits rare and far between. Our new boxes contain 25 Pills each, the old only have 21. WILL. PECK.
