A LEGEND OF LIFE AND LOVE.

A very cheerless and fallacious doctrine is that which teaches us to deny the yielding to natural feelings, righteously directed, because the consequences may be trouble and grief, as well as satisfaction and pleasure.-The man who lives on from year to year, jealous of placing himself in situations where the chances can possibly turn against himice, as it were, surrounding his heart, and his mind too scrupulously weighing in a balthose propensities his Creator has planted in his heart-may be a philosopher, but can never be a happy man.

Upon the banks of a pleasant river stood a cottage, the residence of an ancient man, whose limbs were feeble with the weight of years and of sorrow. In his appetites easily gratified, like the simple race of people among whom he lived, every want of existence was supplied by a few fertile acres. Those acres were tilled and tended by two brothers, grandsons of the old man, and dwellers also in the cottage. The parents of the boys lay buried near by.

Nathan, the elder, had hardly seen his twenticth summer. He was a beautiful youth. Glossy hair clustered upon his head, and his cheeks were very brown from sunshine and open air. Though the eyes of Nathan were soft and liquid, like a girl's, and his cheeks curled with a voluptuous swell, exercise and labor had developed his limbs into noble and manly proportions. The bands of hunters, as they met sometimes to start off together after the game upon the neighboring hills, could hardly show one among their number who in comeliness, strength or activity, might compete with the youthful Nathan. Mark was but a year younger than his brother. He, too, had great beauty.

Mark sighed and answered not. Then, in a little while, they made enquiries about what had befallen either during it is a pleasant world still, and affords much the time past. Seated upon the marble by joy to the dwellers !" which they had met, Mark briefly told his

" I bethink me, brother, many, many years have indeed passed over since the sorrowful day when our grandsire, dying, left us to seek our fortunes amid a wicked and seductive world.

"His last words, as thou, doubtless, dost remember, advised us against the snares that should beset our subsequent journeyings. He portrayed the dangers that were a the path of love; he impressed upon our minds the folly of placing confidence in human honor; and warned us to keep aloof from too close a communion with our kind : he then died, but his instructions live, and have There is a superb Rock Stable. two stories high, twenever been present in my memory.

" Dear Nathan, why should I conceal from you that at that time I loved. My simple ance the results of giving away to any of soul, ungifted with the wisdom of our aged relative, had vielded to the delicious folly, and the brown eyed Eva was my young heart's choice. O, brother, even now, the feeble sand Dollars. and withered thing I am, dim recollections, pleasant passages, come forth around me, like the joy of old dreams. A boy again, and in the confiding heart of the boy, I walk with Eva by the river's hanks. And the gentle desirable residence, at a very reduced price, creature blushes at my protestations of love, and leans her check upon my neck. The regal sun goes down in the west, and we gaze upon the glory of the clouds that attend his sitting, and while we look at their fantastic changes, a laugh sounds out, clear like a flute and merry as the jingling of silver bells. It is the laugh of Eva.'

The eye of the old man glistened with unwonted brightness. He paused, sighed, the much smaller and shorter than the fifth. He says brightness faded away, and he went on with that he belongs to two men, Jno. Davis and John s narration. In the course of time the ancient sickened, and knew that he was to die. Before the approach of the fatal hour, he called before him the two youths, and addressed them thus:

" The world, my children, is full of deceit. Evil men swarm in every place ; and sorrow and disappointment are the fruits of intercourse with them. So wisdom is wary.

"And as the things of life are only shad ows, passing like the darkness of a cloud, twine no bands of love about your hearts. For love is the fickle-t thing of life. The object of our affection dies, and we thenceforth languish in agony ; or perhaps the love we covet dics, and that is more painful yet.

"It is well never to confide in any man. It is well to keep aloof from the follies and impurities of earth. Let there be no links between you and others. Let not any being control you through your dependence upon him for a portion of your happiness. This, my sons, I have learned by bitter experience, is the teaching of truth." Within a few days afterward, the old man was placed away in the marble tomb of his kindred, which was built on a hill by the shore.

Now the injunction given to Nathan, and his brother-injunctions frequently impressed upon them before by the same monitorial voice-were pondered over by each, youth in his inmost heart. They had always habitually respected their grandsire : whatever came from his mouth, therefore, seemed as the words of an oracle, not to be gainsayed.

Soon the path of Nathan chanced to be sundered from that of Mark.

And the trees leaved out, and then in autumn cast their foliage ; and in due course again-and the brothers met not yet.

score years and ten !

As the sun, an hour ere setting, cast long withered and with hair thin and snowy, our arms around each other. came wearily up from opposite directions, and stood together at a tomb built on a hill down their cheeks, and, their frames tremble married the woman I loved.

'I went amid the world. Acting upon the wise principles which our aged friend taught us, I looked upon everything with suspicious eyes. Alas! I found it but too true that iniquity and deceit are the ruling spirits of men.

"Some called me cold, calculating, and unamiable ; but it was their own unworthiness that made me appear so to their eyes. I am not-you know, my brother-I am not, naturally of proud and repulsive manner; but I was determined never to give my friendship merely to be blown off again, it might chance, as a feather by the wind, nor county and delivered to me, or TWENTY-FIVE interweave my course of life with those that very likely would draw all the advantage of the connexion, and leave me no better than before.

"I engaged in traffic. Success attended me. Enemies said that my good fortune was the result of chance, but I knew it the fruit of the judicious system of caution which governed me in matters of business, as well as of social intercourse.

"My brother, thus have I lived my life. Your look asks me if I have been happy. Dear brother, truth impels me to say no .-Yet assuredly, if few glittering pleasures ministered to me on my journey, equally few were the disappointments, the hopes blighted, the trusts betrayed, the faintings of the soul, caused by the defection of those in whom I had laid up treasures.

"Ah, my brother, the world is full of misery !"

The disciple of a wretched faith ceased his story, and there was silence a while. Then Nathan spake :

'In my early years,' he said, ' I too loved a beautiful woman. Whether my heart was more frail than thine, or affection had gained a mightier power over me, I could not leaved out again, and again, and many times part from her I loved without the satisfaction of a farewell kiss. We met-I had resolved Two score years and ten! What change to stay but a moment-I had chalked out described thine.
