SCENE IN THE CAPITOL.

Only one thing is wanting to render our Capitol and "its fixings" worthy of the Old North; and that is a good substantial Iron Railing around the Square. All strangers speak of this want of finish to a great con-

One day during our late Jubilee, after dinner, Mr. Clay and some fifteen or twenty gentlemen, all supposed to be more or less hilarious, visited the Capitol. On entering the Senate Chamber, some one laughingly moved that the gentleman from Guilford take the Chair. Whereupon His Excellency took the hint-and the Chair also-and announged that the Senator from Kentucky was entilled to the floor. Quick as thought, Mc Clay uncovered himself, placed his chapeau under his arm, stepped out into the aisle fronting the Chair, and having addressed-"Mr. President," with one of his graceful bows, launched out into a glowing eulogy upon the noble edifice in which they were then deliberating-the grandeur of its design—the Architectural taste displayed in its conception-its brilliant execution-the superb, overnowering magnificence of the massive structure, destined to stand for ages like the Coliseum at Rome, a splendid monument of the enlightened spirit that planned, and the munificent liberality that executed the glorious work. Here it stands, and here it will stand perhaps forever. Yes, sir, generaliens yet unborn will gaze with reverence and admiration on this stupentlous pile; and will benor the memory of this generation for having accomplished this noble chef-d'œuvre. The Architect might have proudly looked but upon it as it went from his hands, and pronounced it "good." It is perfect, said Mr. Clay-absolutely perfect ! But why, Mr. President, should not this great Temple, consecrated by the genius of Freedom-and these glorious old Oaks, its familiars, bullowed by time-be appropriated exclusively larly for Cash. to the sacred purposes for which they are intended? Why should not the People's House and its beautiful environs receive the same care as the mansion and grounds of a private gentleman? Sir, I move that dollars be appropriated to the construction of an Iron Railing around the Capitol Square. The question was put and carried nem. con-The party then adjourned to the Commons
