George Reid, Feb. 1st, 1847 if.

Mr. Randolph's Speech On the Compensation Law.

Mr. RANDOLPH, understanding the whole merits of the bill to be before the House on the present question, which he had not before understood to be the case, proceeded to deliver his views of it.

This question, he said, had assumed a character, had put on an appearance and quality which did not belong to it. As such, he for one was willing to strip it of its borrowed plumes. That, if a sentiment exist in the public mind, it is immaterial in what manner manifested, it is entitled to weight, he agreed; but he was not prepared either to affirm or deny that the sentiment which the gentleman had said pervaded the whole continent, was the ruling sentiment. In what manner had it been excited? The honorable member had said that in all parts of the country, however disconnected with one another, there existed but one opinion in relation to the law. This country, said Mr. R. is or was but lately divided into two great parties which possessed complete and efficient control over the press. No sooner did the law of the last session pass, than both parties started in the race of popularity to run down that law. To this fact must be attributed the general sentiment of indignation which had been referred to. He held in his hand, he said, an authority on the state and condition of England—and here we had proceeded pari passu—that by means of the press the sentiment which exists in the heart of the body politic, is propagated and diffused to its remotest extremities. In this way the present public indignation, it did exist, had been excited. Gentlemen, Mr. R. said, had spoken of their districts; he would speak of his. It had been for some time past a sort of ward in chancery, and every constituted authority, from the President of the United States to the printer's devil, had it in his especial care; and yet, he was bold to say, that in that district such a sentiment as the Speaker represented to prevail throughout the United States did not exist. To the cause he had mentioned, was to be attributed (disgraceful fact!) the public excitement which was represented to exist. The people of the United States, Mr. R. said, were, as they had been represented to be, a virtuous high minded people. They had borne, and would ever continue to bear, burthens and privations of the most enormous and distressing kind, so as they were convinced, rightly or not, that the public weal required them. They had borne the embargo; they had borne the miserable non importation system; they had borne a long, bloody, destructive, and in some respects disastrous war; they had borne with mismanagement in the Camp and in the Senate, and they would ever bear with it, so long as they believe that the intentions of those clothed with power, have been honest and good.

But we are told, said Mr. R. that this is a matter of money; that the whole report of the select committee on the subject, is about money. And about what did the committee report. The subject matter of their report, was money; and what other subject should they have spoken of? Would the gentleman have had them talk of fortifications, of military and naval defence, of roads and canals, or of the National University? I have, said Mr. R. a much more serious fault than that to find with this report—that the last member of the syllogism is in direct contradiction to the major and minor. It is true, Mr. R. said (referring probably to the absence of Mr. Webster, the reputed author of that report) that those men who come from the greatest distance to Congress, suffer most. What, he asked, was the situation of the men whom we follow to their long and dreary abode, in this place, because intelligence cannot reach their abodes in time to draw their friends around them before their death? That we are bound to hold the opinions of the people in high respect, said Mr. R. I agree; but there are some subjects on which we are better qualified to give than to receive instruction. Any man, who has had experience of public life in this place, is better able to say what is a reasonable compensation, than any man who has not been here; and, when I talk of reasonable compensation, do I mean to say there is any assignable relation between services on this floor and money? None—there is none. No sum of mere money, taking it for granted the party is separated from his wife or children—ignorant of each other's situation, when one, or both, or all, may be struggling in the agonies of death—no compensation can remunerate a man for his suffering in that circumstance.

In that part of the country, where it was notorious that wealth was not accumulated as in others, how would they, Mr. R. asked, be able to send men here to struggle with the wealth of the South and West? For, he said, he had no hesitation in saying, that the wealth, as well as the power and talent of the country, was travelling in a south-western direction. Wealth, and wealth only, would become a passport to a seat here. He asked, what must not be the avarice of that wretch, who, for $1500, would sell his country and himself? Look, he said, at the compensation we give to the common sailor; or look at the compensation to the captains of our navy, and to the field and general officers of the army, and compare it with the compensation the law of the last session went to give members of Congress. If he thought the
