Maggie's Mistake.

BY LELA.
CHAPTER II.

Maggie paid unusual attention to her toilet that evening. She wished to make an impression on the handsome stranger, for we have said she was fond of admiration. In truth she was beginning to tire of Charley. Not that she had ceased to care for him; no, far from it, but she, like most young ladies, imagined life to be like some novel and she wanted a good deal of romance in her plans for the future. She was too easily attracted toward fair external, and had not learned to appreciate the real worth of the man to whom she had pledged herself for life.

And dearly did she pay for her folly, many weary months dragged heavily by because of it, and she learned, when too late, that she had well nigh wrecked her own happiness. As for Charley, he had too much confidence in her to believe her capable of playing him false, yet he confessed to himself that he felt the foreboding of coming trouble.

The brilliant drawing rooms of the Graham mansion were filled with the youth and beauty of the town, and the pleasant hostess was welcoming her guests with her most bewitching smiles. Mr. Steele was there, so was Maggie, so was Charley.

Maggie had never looked half so well. Her trailing dress of rich pearl colored silk, fitted her exquisite form to perfection. Around her neck and arms sparkled brilliant rubies; a bandeau of the same gems crowned her handsome head and well became her dark beauty. Her cheeks glowed with excitement, and her eyes sparkled with animation and pleasure. She excited universal admiration, and among the most attentive was Ed. Steele.

He was at once arrested by her pretty face and charming manners, and the evening passed so rapidly, that both were astonished when the time for departure arrived.

People wondered that Maggie allowed such marked attention from a stranger, and poor Charley, left in the background, went off and tried to interest himself by talking to Bessie Grey, but failed. Bessie was Maggie's particular friend and confident, and Charley liked her because she liked Maggie.

He was far from comfortable, and would glance frequently out in the grounds where several couples were promading, and among them Steele and Maggie. Bessie noticed all this, and told him playfully that he was jealous. That did not help him, for the truth hurts. He had been deceived in one whom he thought free from error. But to-night she had flirted too freely, to suit his notions, and his confidence in her was greatly shaken.

Still he was too proud to speak to her about it, and matters took their course. This course was a very long one too, for Steele did not leave the next week as he had at first intended, but prolonged his stay indefinitely.

Some days after the events recorded last, Maggie with sketch-book in hand, went out for the purpose of taking some views she had seen and admired. She soon reached her destination, and seating herself, proceeded with her drawing.

Gradually the outlines assumed the desired shape, and soon the whole object was unerringly impressed on the paper. Maggie had a natural fancy for drawing, which, having had proper cultivation, was a source of much amusement and pastime to her. She was giving a few finishing strokes, making a deeper shade here and a more decided touch there, when a rustle of leaves and a quick step fell on her ear. She turned and beheld Mr. Steele. He had come out for a stroll he said, and was delighted to meet her for his walk had indeed been solitary.

She excused herself, and made preparations to start, but he detained her, and throwing himself lazily on the grass, asked to be her sketcher. Thus they beguiled the fast flying moments, and when they parted he asked permission to visit her.

This was readily granted, and day after day, saw him in Maggie's company. They walked, rode, sketched and sang together. Her strange conduct was the main support of the village gossip. Her parents remonstrated in vain. At last Charley ventured to speak to her on the subject, but was told that she was her own mistress until she was married, and that he had better reserve his lecture until after that event took place. This had the effect of silencing Charley, so he took his leave very much perplexed.

One evening as Maggie returned from a drive with her new admirer, she found a note on her table. Recognizing the direction as Charley's, she supposed it contained a scolding for her, so she did not touch it, but went into the dining-room where the family was already assembled for the evening meal.

As she approached, she heard her mother say: "I wonder what whim took Charley from town so suddenly! I guess I can find out from Maggie, though it is strange he did not call to say good bye to any of us."

As she caught these words Maggie's head grew dizzy, and she would have fallen had she not caught hold of a chair for support. She did not enter, but went to her room and seized the note long ing, yet fearing to open it.

At last, having reached that point where the worst is better than suspense, she broke the seal and read as follows: "Maggie:

When I first became a man and gazed upon your face, I loved you well; when I received your promise to be mine, I loved you better; but now, when I see you surely and steadily from me, I love you with all the madness and fervor of my nature. I have found my idol clay, and I am punished henceforth I live for nothing—an aimless life. But long years may bring a Letho for my bitter woe. Keep the ring—the seal of our betrothal. I shall not see you again, I start for Europe to night. Be happy in another's love, but sometimes breathe a prayer for one who erred in loving not unwisely but too well. CHARLIE.

She felt turned to stone and stood clinching the paper and crumbling it into a thousand wrinkles. She glanced at the sparkling diamond that adorned her slender finger; then she fully realized the folly of the course she had taken, and knew that although they were separated forever, though he was entirely lost to her, she could never give her love to another; and she pressed the gleaming jewel to her lips repeatedly, as if caresses could recall him whom she had driven from her by gratifying one caprice of her wayward nature.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)
Love induced a young girl, during the recent cold spell in Minnesota, to strip all her clothing and spread them over her lover, who had sunk exhausted at the wood-pile. She kept herself warm by dancing about her bedroom. Her lover was saved.

PROFANE SWEARING.

Except the vice of intemperance there is no other which a man can so easily acquire, and which is so wholly unnecessary as the use of profane language. The true gentleman will never be found indulging in the miserable and disgraceful practice of swearing; none but wicked specimens of humanity, who are already lost to moral principle, ever indulge in the low debasing habit. There are however men of high standing and influential position in society, who feel themselves particularly privileged to use the name of the Lord their God, as their feelings dictate. These individuals are the greatest obstacles in the way of morality and Christianity; they are the cause of numberless tallow beings, falling into the dangerous habit.

Profanity loosens the restraints of virtue, demoralizes the heart, and debases the soul. Would these men use such wicked and debasing language if they entertained one spark of regard for the Great Being they so thoughtlessly profane? Do the spirits of such men ever aspire to the society of the spirits of "just men made perfect?" Does a ray of light from God descend to dispel the gloom from their darkened pathway?

The man who is in the habitual practice of profane swearing is a reproach on the Christian name—a stigma on the character of the community in which he lives. We long to hear all Christians everywhere disclaim all alliance with those who live in the hourly violation of that most sacred precept, "Swear not at all."

THE ROLL OF CHIEF JUSTICE.—It is noticed, in connection with the death of Chief Justice Chase, that no man has been promoted directly from Associate to Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The first Chief Justice was John Jay. Whilst he was Chief Justice he accepted the mission to England, and held both offices for a year. On his return from England he vacated both offices and became Governor of New York. John Rutledge, of South Carolina, who had been Associate Justice, but resigned to become Chief Justice in his own State, was nominated to the Chief Justiceship by president Washington, but rejected by the Senate. The next Chief Justice was Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, and a Senator from that State at the time of his appointment. He presided in the Supreme Court less than a year, and then, without resigning accepted the French mission and held both offices until the negotiation of the French treaty, when he resigned both. John Marshall, of Virginia, who was then Secretary of State, was appointed by President Adams Chief Justice in January, 1801. He remained in the Cabinet until close of President Adams' administration in March of the same year, when he took his seat on the bench and filled the position of Chief Justice till his death in 1835. President Jackson appointed Roger B. Taney as his successor, and he filled the position until his death in 1864, when Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, was appointed by Mr. Lincoln. Although Mr. Chase's incumbency extended through only eight years, he occupied the position longer than any other of the Chief Justices except Marshall and Taney, whose joint terms extended through sixty-four years.

A San Bernardino (cal) assessor asked a woman how many chickens she had, and doubting her word, proceeded to count them. She took him to the bee hive, kicked it over, and invited him to count the bees. He'll take a woman's word next time.
