It is stated that at Berlin glass eastings for pump barrels, etc., are drilled, planed and bored like iron oues, and in the same lathes and machines, by the aid of sulphuric acid.

A clergyman's mode of rat-catching, as described in an exchange, is worthy the attention of Mr. Henry Bergh. He uses a wire cage trap, and when a rat is caught, instead of incontinently killing him, he treats his prisoner liberally with food and drink, until he is fat, tame and contented. Others will then crowd in to share his good fortune (is he is not large enough to drive them away), and may be removed at leisure and despatched.

A circumstance apparently confirma tory of the disputed theory of a molecular change in iron from mechanical shocks, is related by a correspondent of the Scientific American at Underhill, Vt. He says that an old relic of the Revolution, a French gun barrel, which had been refitted with new stocks and locks several times, after standing fire perhaps the millionth time, burst, and in such a manner that every one who saw it pronounced it to have been originally a cast iron barrel, until an old iron maker convinced them by showing a weldron the underside. But the appearance otherwise was exactly like cast-iron, and brittle at that. The change in the iron was attributed to the action of the sulphur in the powder and its long use and many times repeated action, or more east busted west are atoult

At a recent meeting of the London vated in glycerine.

That new and scarce attainable metal, in dium, has been produced in decidedly perceptible quality by M. Reichter, who first succeeded in isolating it. M. Reichter lately presented to the Paris Academy of Science two prism-shaped specimens of indium, about four inches long, with sides one-half and three-fourths of an inch wide. It is atained in faint traces, in a precipitate derived from the solution of zine in sulphuric acid. Its presence in zinc and its close resemblance to cadmium, which also accompanies the ores of zinc, have led to the conjecture that these two obscure metals are the same. The distinctive traits of indium, however, leave no doubt upon this point, its only known oxide, unlike that of cadmium, being insoluble in ammonia, and its spectrum being distinguished by a bright indigo ray. Its color, smell and other properties somewhat resemble these

The Providence Journal discourses on amber as follows: "Amber is found on the southern shore of the Baltic, where it is cast up by the action of the ground swell after the northerly gales. It is also found on the coast of Sicily, on the Adritions all over Europe. Still amber continues to be the gem of the sea," by which it is yielded only after a storm, and in such small quantities that its value has ever remained undiminished. Amber is found in masses, irregularly shaped, and usually of small size. The color is of all shades, from a pale straw to deep orange. It is brittle, but can be easily cut with a sharp knife, it is the opinion, and is only an opinion, that it is simply an exuded vegetable juice. Baron Leibig thinks it probable that "amber is a product of the decay of wax, or of some other substance allied to the fied oils." Sir David Brewster says that amber is an undurated vegetable juice. Wood, leaves, flowers and fruit have been found inclosed in amber, and recognized as having belonged to coniferous trees now extinct. Sicilian amber is usually of a deeper color than that from the Baltic, and it is said that in Germany an experienced amber worker can determine the locality of amber from differences in its apperance. Neither is it invariably found in a hard state. An instance is on record of a gentleman having received from a friend living on the Baltic coast a piece so soft as to take an impression of his seal; and another piece is described as soft on one side and hard hev votid wunst and boostid us into Con- The Chemical News promises that a on the other.
