up by impassioned descriptions of the death of Hussein, the guilt and treachery of the murders, &c. At last the beating upon their breasts sounded like the roar of thunder. The cries of agony and yells of rage became frightful. Their distorted faces, their frantic movements and their singular dresses seen in the torchlight made one tremble in spite of himself. But the worst was to come. When it appeared as though the fanaticisms and madness of these thousands could not be increased to a higher point, I suddenly heard a new and more frightful chorus of yells, and then appeared a sedan borne on the shoulders of men clad in ancient armor, containing four children, to represent the wives of Hussein, who were weeping and crying. Following this there rushed into the square 200 to 300 men, each with a drawn sword in his hand, and with no other clothing than a white shirt. These men, crying out like the others, cut their heads and faces with their swords, until their white shirts were soaked with blood and their heads a mass of wounds. Their arrival seemed to rouse the passions of all to the highest pitch, and the scene that followed was one which seen could never be forgotten.
