The dead has come to life. Salt river has surrendered another victim from its fatal, murky waters. Judge Alton B. Parker is the man who has been given back to us. He made his re-apearance at Portland, Maine, not long since in the role of an anti-administration spouter. ' He lambasted Mr. Roosevelt on all sides, without calling his name. He insinuated that the President was a demagogue and a disturber of our present era of prosperity.

Land sakes! Who would have thought it? The country had the idea that the once powerful man of name has not appeared in print in so long that we had to take a second look at it before we 'recognized it

It appears that the Judge slipped away off to Maine to get off his baing in his heart ever since that fatal day in November, 1904. He probably thought his harrangue to his law audience would escape the papers, but it seems that a reporter was present who took down every word he said. If you haven't read the speech. you've missed a treat. It sounds like the sorrowful threnody in a voice from the tomb. You would recognize it in Hades or anywhere else, for it has the old-time ring to it. Yet in this instance his name is put in a glaring head-line above his address. so there can be no mistake.

President Roosevelt gets the full weight of the Judge's somewhat belated avenging blow. Every sentence of the speech gives the President the Medusa frown. No doubt the Judge's auditors knew for whom the term "designing demagogue" was meant. The Chief Executive was held up by the narrative while the vehement Judge pumped
