Farmers certainly err seriously, say the New England Farmer, when they spend valuable time using worthles tools; but it is of little use to urge a man to plough his land well when we know that he has not a tool on his farm fit to work with. Our advice to a man who proposes to make farming a business would be to sell off many of his old tools occasionally at anction, or to men who have but little use for farming tools, and replace them with the best, well tested, new styles he can find. A new plough point may cost from fifty cents to a dollar, but it may enable the ploughman and team to earn two dollars where the old one would not earn one. Peer ploughing. by the use of a worn-out plough, may diminish a crop very materially.

Pot a heaping teaspoonful of Paris green into a pailful of water, apply the minture with a force pump, throwing the water through the tree theroughly.
