CHAPTER L. A CHANCE MEETING.

On a damp, unpleasant day, late in the mouth of February, two young women were hastening through a crowd - for the street was full of people, notwithstanding the dismal weather. The place was the upper part of Broadway, above Malison Square, and both these girls were going in the same direction, toward the north, both walking at the same pace, and keeping the ing at the same pace, and keeping the same distance between them, so that an observer might well have functed that one was in pursuit of the other. This was partly true, although neither was access of it. The foremost of the girls was handsome, richly and elegantly attited, bright and happy; the other was pair, sait, plainly dressed other was pale, sad, plainly dressed and, though her face was of the kind that point under exceptional exceptional
