What kind of a pid was thit, whe could remain in her room without se-much anxiety as to ask a question-when the whole household had been turned upside down by Mary's first plicable illness? It was evidenty not inexplicable to her, or why was she as-pade and agitated? And by this time. Mrs. Hamilton had remeablered that Dolores was in the drawing-room on his lips indicated that the tears which were how being forced from Folly's eyes, and the soles and sight that were chaking her slight form would do no re to carry off the first would to her sorrow than anything that could be put into words. "Let her weep," he whispered, per-sently, "Words will only stop the flow of tears—let her weep. The grief that dissolves in tears will never break the heart." Mrs. Headiton could only realy by Dolores was in the drawing-room when Stanley had been shown into it. She must, then, have still been there She must, then, have still been there when Mary entered. She must have known why she had fainted. More than that, she was, perhaps, the cause of that drendful and unexplained swoon which had seeme I to threaten the very life of her child. All this passed through the anxious mather's mind in an instant, and produced its effect before she was aware of it; and although she felt the unconscious pathos in Dislores's voice, due hard-ened her heart against it, and maned resolutely away.

Mrs. Hamilton could only reply by frantic but helpless wringing of her hands. Why should any one speak of Polly's heart breaking? What cruel grief had been east on her innocent, grief had been cast on her innocent, sweet child to cause such tears? Oh, it was surely mijnst of heaven to tor-ture any one so good and kind and goath? Her dear little Polly, who had never caused a moment's pain or surrow to any living thing? Meantime Polly wept allently, hit-ferly and with a fearful suching of the beart—a terrible despair—as she told herself over and over again the world resolutely away.
