BANKHEAD CASE OPENED BEFORE SUPREME COURT

Washington, Dec. 20.—Heated objections and denials that the AAA is regressive American agriculture today committed the question of this basic farm-aid law's validity to the judgment of the supreme court.

In a stance contrasting sharply with their pointed questions of yesterday, the nine justices heard closing pleas in the Hoosier Mills case, only to become quickly articulate as debate opened, immediately thereafter, on the constitutionality of the Bankhead cotton control act.

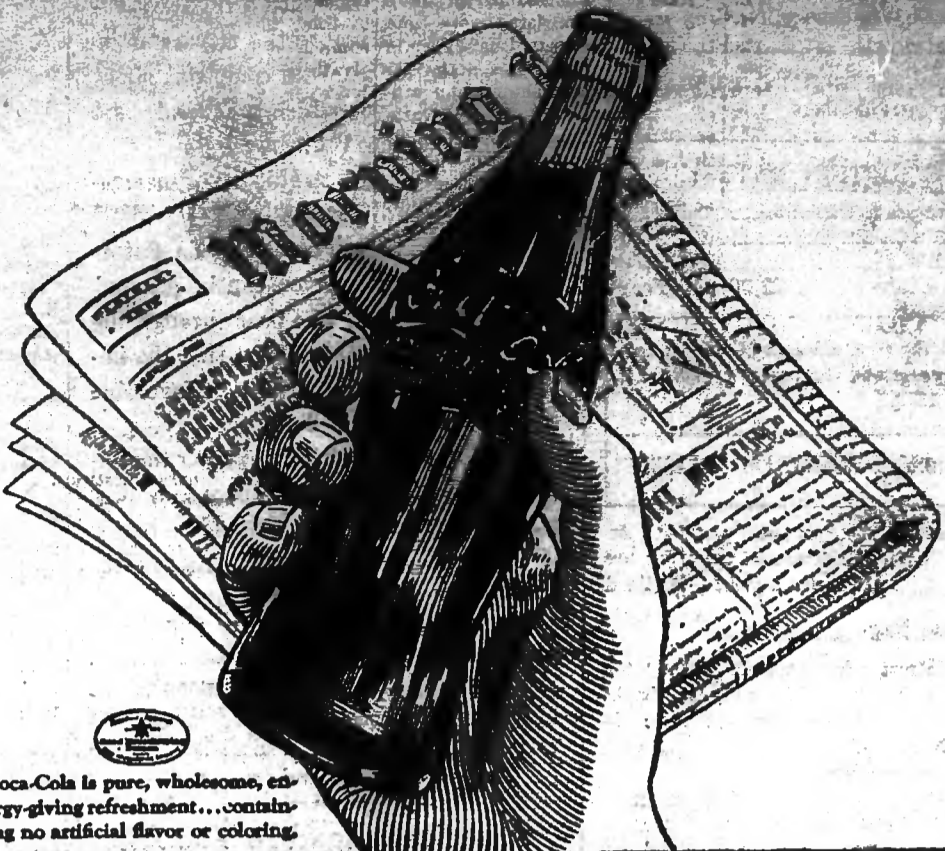

Solicitor-General Stanley Reed, the subject of yesterday's bombardment from the bench, wound up the government's case in behalf of AAA only to collapse under the tension late in the day when he arose to argue the Bankhead law as a "friend of the court."

He had begun to contend the issue of constitutionality was not properly before the court in the Lee Moor case when the justices again interrupted with questions. Reed faltered and abruptly announced that he would have to continue later. As he was assisted to his chair, Chief Justice Hughes adjourned court, although it was only 4:15 p. m., 15 minutes early. Reed appeared to feel better in a few minutes. He was helped outside and taken home.

The agricultural adjustment act authorizes taxes on processing firms to finance payments to farmers who participate in crop adjustment programs. The Bankhead law imposes a prohibitive ginning tax on cotton produced in excess of quotas fixed by the secretary of agriculture.

First questions in the Bankhead case, in which Lee Moor, Texas planter, is suing a railroad for refusing to carry cotton on which the ginning tax had not been paid, indicated the justices were concerned with whether the tax applied only to cotton and moved in interstate commerce.
