Books Will Be Distributed to Schools During Coming Week

Wilkes county's 85 schools, 76 white and nine colored, will open their doors for the 1938-39 term on Monday, August 29, C. B. Elfor, superintendent of the county system, said today. Recent progress on the school building at Wilkesboro has dispelled fears that Wilkesboro schools might be delayed a week or two in opening and judging from present indications the new ten-room building as addition to the school plant will be ready for use in time to open on the 29th, Mr. Eller said, although he explained that the building will not be entirely finished that time.

Preparations for schools opening have been going on for some time and the 260 teachers, 239 white and 21 colored, have been engaged for the term.

With schools opening on the same date it is expected that a uniform schedule will be carried out over all the county system during the term and that the schools will reach the half-way point by time for adjournment for Christmas holidays and begin the second half when schools resume work about January 1.

Contracts have been let for contract bus transportation and for fuel supplies at the various schools. Student bus drivers have been employed for the county buses and other details have been looked after, including minor repairs to buildings.

The term to begin Monday will be the second in which free textbooks will be furnished students in the elementary grades. The books will be distributed to the icial, or his successor, should be the county agents office to the University of Virginia and beassignments to students on open-
