

Gay's Job In Filling Station Provided Benefits For His Family

This is one of a series of stories which explain the value of old-age and survivor benefits. The story is based on the names used here.

So lucky, irresponsible was Dick Guy; but Edith, his wife, adored him and her son regarded him with interest when Dick was not very often. Mr. Guy worked at a filling station—four hours in the morning and four at night. That left only the afternoons for him to play.

Then one winter's night Dick Guy died. The doctor said it was pneumonia.

Edith took her baby and her two younger sisters and went back to her parents. But there were three younger sisters at home and Dad's salary was pitifully small. For awhile the situation seemed rather hopeless. Then one day came a letter from Dick's former employer, calling attention to the fact that the young husband was insured under the Government old-age and survivor insurance system.

Dick's social security card had been lost, but Edith remembered that he had scratched his account number in the back of his watch; so she was able to report his account number when she applied for benefits at the office of the Social Security Board. While in this field office a member of the staff helped her fill out the application blank, which every claimant is expected to do.

Examination of Dick Gay's wage record showed that he had worked two years and eight months in covered employment since he reached his 21st birthday in 1937; that he had held jobs with four different business concerns and that his average wage amounted to a little less than $100 per month. On the basis of this record—which was maintained for him by the accounting division of the Social Security Board, his wife and baby were awarded monthly benefits of about $30 per month—$18 for the widow, $12 for the child.

If Edith does not remarry she will receive a Government check every month until young Richard reaches the age of 18. That is, she will receive this payment unless she goes regularly to work in employment that is covered by the Social Security Act. She might teach in a public school, or enter domestic service, or work for the Government, or for a religious or charitable institution, and still be eligible for monthly insurance benefits; but if she takes a job in a commercial or industrial establishment where she is paid $15 or more per month her payments of survivors insurance will be suspended during the time she is so employed. But regardless of whether or not his mother works or remarries, the son will receive his payment of $12 per month until he is 16 years old (18 if in school).

Further information about old-age and survivors insurance may be obtained at the Salisbury office of the Social Security Board, 301 Post Office Building.

In North Carolina 1231 children were jailed in 1936, all under 16 years of age. The number lowered to 1076 in 1937; dropped to 883 in 1938 and last year was down to 784.
