The Allies generally strengthened their toeholds in the Reich's main western defenses but gave ground slightly in the Belfort Gap and southwest of Pruem in Germany near the center of the line.

Powerful German armored and infantry forces were ascertained to be moving south across the lower Rhine at Suissen, eight miles north of Nijmegen, early Sunday. Contact was made with the Second Army at 4 p. m. after the enemy attack groups had been roundly blasted by the Typhoons despite poor visability.

There were few details on the ground action other than that the British were in control of the situation and that the Germans had made no important advances beyond the distance they had to cover to reach the Allied line, believed established a few miles above Nijmegen.
