HOME NOTES

New Flour
A new sweet potato flour has been developed by the Alabama Experiment Station and named Alamalt. This is a fully cooked flour and differs in properties and uses from the flour made from dehydrated sweet potatoes.

Alamalt is made by baking sweet potatoes, peeling, pulping, and then drying, toasting and finally grinding the pulp. It is light yellow in color but when moistened turns to a deep orange brown. Cakes, muffins and soft cookies made with it do not dry out rapidly because the flour absorbs and holds moisture well.

Alamalt has been found especially good for fruit cakes, layer cakes, Southern brown bread, cookies, biscuits, muffins, icings and pies—in tests. In cakes it may be used to replace part of the eggs, butter and sugar at considerable saving in cost with improvement in flavor and texture. Cakes prepared this way have a rich creamy flavor, fine texture and grain, and elasticity. They hold moisture about twice as long as plain cakes. Light colored cakes made with Alamalt have a clear orange yellow color.

Icings to which Alamalt is added are smooth and creamy in texture and retain freshness much longer than other icings. Off-grade potatoes make just as satisfactory a product as No. 1 potatoes, provided they are sound and well cured. This is of importance to growers, shippers and manufacturers.

Other uses for Alamalt are in premixed pie bases for institutional use including a mix of pumpkin and sweet potato, in ice cream to give a rich color and caramel flavor and in milk shakes.

Christmas and New Year's are weeks off, but not to the homemakers who want to avoid that last minute rush. One of the biggest jobs she has to face is making the Yuletide fruit cakes. And it is one of the holiday foods which may be made well in advance and one which improves with age.

All good cooks know that fruit cakes should be properly aged in order to achieve their full mellow flavor. At least four to six weeks should be allowed for this mellowing process. One indication of the goodness of a fruit cake is its moistness. If the cake crumbles and breaks when cut, the fault usually lies in the way it has been stored. Although you may be familiar with these suggestions for proper aging of your fruit cake, they are worthy of repetition:

Fruit cake should be stored in air-tight containers. Keep cake wrapped in damp cloth or wax paper. Cake may be wrapped in a cloth soaked with wine, brandy or fruit juice. Wine or fruit juice may be poured over cake in very small quantities at frequent intervals until completely matured. An apple may be stored in the container with the fruit cake. Fruit cake may be left in glass baking dish when stored. All fruit cake should be kept in a moist wrapper, being unwrapped only to serve. Many homemakers like to glaze and decorate their fruit cakes. This should be done after aging period.

White Fruit Cake
2-3 cup butter or substitute, 1 3-4 cups cake flour, sifted, 1-2 t. soda, 2 t. lemon juice, 6 egg whites beaten stiff, 1 1-4 cup candied pineapple, 2 t. flour with fruit. Cream butter, gradually add flour sifted with soda. Sift sugar into beaten egg whites, combine the 2 mixtures, add lemon juice, fruit, and nuts, cut fine and sprinkle with 2 t. flour. Mix well and bake in pan lined with wax paper. Bake 1 hour at 325 F. This particular cake should be used soon after baking and not allowed to age.
