

This Is Season For Apple Scab

Last week Dr. C. N. Clayton, plant pathologist at N. C. state college, visited orchards in the Brushy Mountains to check on the development of apple scab. He found out that the apple scab fungus which lives over the winter in old apple leaves on the ground has matured its spore or "seed". No doubt some scab infection took place during the rainy period a week ago. However, the showers which came during the early morning of March 31 and again Sunday afternoon did not cause apple scab infection because the new leaves and buds dried off in less than eight hours. The next time we have a rain which keeps the leaves WET a day or all night or both there will be plenty of apple scab infection taking place UNLESS fruit growers have their orchards well sprayed with one of the sulfur fungicides before the rain. Last Spring the growers that had the least amount of scab on their fruit (in some cases, none at all) put on an extra spray of the paste-type wettable sulfur. This extra application is very important when the bloom period is long-drawn out as it is likely to be this year. The grower should pay particular attention to varieties, such as red delicious, that are very susceptible to scab. As Dr. Clayton pointed out when he was here: "It is very important to keep scab infection from getting started on the new leaves and fruit, for once a scab spot develops, thousands of new spores (or seed) are produced on it to cause other infections". "Let's keep 'em covered" with lime sulfur or wettable sulfur paste.
