Cull Non-Layers, Urges Farm Agent

Hens that don't pay their board have no place in a laying flock, County Agent Paul Choplin of the State College Extension Service told Wilkes county farmers this week.

He urged flock owners to cull all early moulters and broody hens as a means of insuring the most efficient egg production and reducing feed costs.

Mr. Choplin explained that the peak of the egg production season is now past, and that broody hens will consume as much feed as producing hens. Moreover, he added, early moulters are notoriously poor egg producers, since they take longer to moult than those that start late, and are non-producers for longer periods than late summer and early fall moulters.

Meanwhile, in Atlanta, Harry Wise, poultry marketing specialist of the Production and Marketing Administration's Poultry Branch, gave strong backing to the local county agent's advice.

"It's just plain good business," Wise declared, "to stop keeping the hens that aren't keeping you. The markets are short on good fat hens, and prices are good. All two-year old hens should be culled and their places in the farm flocks given to young birds. It's an accepted fact that pullets are more profitable layers than hens. Now that hot weather is here, extra care should be taken to insure that eggs are gathered frequently, properly stored, and marketed under the best possible conditions. Better eggs will mean better prices."

Of the two-year-old hens, County Agent Choplin said "such birds are probably producing so few eggs now that the weather has turned hot that they are not paying their feed bill." He advised flock owners to look for birds whose beaks and shanks have begun turning yellow. He also advised producers to handle hens at night while they are on the roost, and to pick out the ones pelvic bones are close together and are not flexible.

Miss Inez Wilson, the first American worker of the Young Woman's Christian Association in the Republic of Liberia, has established a Social Center in Monrovia, where girls and women are organized into clubs and classes in recreation, education, and religious worship and study. Outside of "Y" centers and those of a few churches, there are no social agencies for young or old, male or female.
