A new lay semi-religious orler for women, less professional than deaconesses but equally de-voted to service "within their enviroment," is growing up in Germany out of the great preponderance of women in the post-war marriage is impossible for millions, and the need to fill the population, the realization that hours of lonesomeness with lifeenriching activity. According to reports made by social workers to the World Council of Churches, the new order grows out of the to serve whomever and wherever fact that 9,000,000 German men were killed, permanently disabled, or are missing because of World War II, and that there are almost as many German women who will never marry, never have families, and always be lonely and frustrated. Elsewhere in Europe the situation for women is little better. Says the report, "Women are facing the future with both resignation and an inner bitterness which may foster moral decay."

Large numbers of women, it is said, have sought to join the deaconess orders of the German churches, but because of economic and other reasons the churhose with nurse training.

Wurttemberg, who for years ha worked in the vocational field among women, decided that the solution would be a religious or der free enough to permit them to enter secular professions, but strong enough as a community to be a firm support for each member. The result was the formation of the lay order of "Irenenring" named from the eighth century Roman Empress Irene who achieved Orthodox sainthood. The only emblem of the order is the 'Ring of Irene" with Byzantine Christian symbols. At the simple consecration services, the sisters of the order promise to center their lives in prayer, in the sacraments, in joy over the Resurrection, and they are able. The plan to establish schools for children, homes for the aged, homes for girl apprentices.

Several units of the order have been established in key German cities. The Rev. Lydia Prager has been elected "Mother Superior." The Irenenring has affiliated itself with the women's work of the Evangelical churches of Germany.

Avery County Farmer Logs His Woodland

Charles A. Musser, forestry specialist for the State College Extension Service, says a farmer can profitably log his own woodland. He cites the experience of Gaylord Banner of Banner Elk, Avery County, as a good example. Banner and his brother are selectively logging mature and over-mature hard maple at a nice profit, Musser reports The Avery farmers figure their felling, bucking, and skidding costs at $4 per thousand, and custom sawing at the local mill costs $10 per thousand. The only additional cost is $8 per thousand for trucking lumber to Black Mountain, where it is bought by grade The total cost of the Banners is $22 per thousand, and they resay the average sale price they receive for their lumber is $90 perthousand. This a return of $68 for stumpage and labor. Since stumpage around Banner Elk brings about $10, the Banners figure they average $58 per thousand for their labor in felling, bucking, and skidding.
