Burns, June 8, 1854. My DEAR GALES: -Since I left your Uity of Oaks, I have seen sundry things. I was in the midst of a mob at Brooklyn of "Know Nothings," Irish men, Irish women, and "the rest of mankind." It was a tolerably serious busi ness, even to a looker-on. Those who came out of the scrape with bruised heads and broken legs might call it by a haraher name. Esca-ping from the row in Brooklyn, I found myself in the midst of one over the River, on Broadway, quite as noisy and numerously attended.

though not quite so dangerous to a gaping stran-ger. There were not so many brick bats filling the air—though there was some tall halloing and cursing. It arose, in both cases, from some peripatetic Angel Gabriel holding forth in the streets, upon the wicked operations of the scarlet woman of Babylon and Papistry in general. Whereupon, the Irish of both sexes set themselves to prove, in the old Irish way,

" Their doctrines orthodox By Apostolic blows and knocks."

But you have seen all this in the papers. The nigger excitement took a lull on the deperture of the Ethiopian hero who caused it. By the way, Burns is said to have taken it all very coolly, and to have amused himself to a high degree by the fantastic follies of his sympathising friends. was put on trial on the morning of the 7th., about 11 A. M. The District Attorney used the defendant Woodfin as a witness to prove that the papers alleged to be forged came to his hands in the State, that they were found at the Department, and that he, Woodfin, did not alter them. Woodfin sustained this in a clear and candid manner,exhibiting all the bearing of a man innocent at 35 a $36. of any offence connected with the transaction. He could not, as he said, exculpate the defendant, because he did not see him. He, Woodfin, was from home, and lived, then, about one hundred miles from Johnston. He came home and found the papers left for him, and, not doubting they were properly prepared, sent them, without more than a cursory glance, to whether there was any forgery or not, -nor, if so, when it was committed.

The evidence of this witness, if credited, left the forgery, if there was any, between Mastin and Waugh, or one of them, and the defendant. The case was fully argued, and the whole matter apparently thoroughly understood by the jury, who were men of high character and good practical sense.
