WEDNESDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, '62.

THE SURRENDER OF NASHVILLE.

A gentleman who left Nashville shortly after the battle at Fort Donelson, communicates to the Mobile Tribune an interesting account of the evacuation and surrender of the city, a portion of which we append :

The fight at Fort Donelson on the 13th, 14th and 15th of February, was of intense concern to us, and each day's work down there wound up with the statement that the fight would be renew. ed to-morrow. The fears that the fall of Fort Henry were calculated to inspire, had been well high discelled by the way Fort Donelson was Lolding out. It was better located, and stronger in men and guns. Pillow, Floyd and Buckner were there. Pillow had said-let come what might, he never would surrender the place, and Nashville felt that we could not afford to lose that battle. Saturday's work was glorious. Our citizens shouled over it. Many were saying, "I never liked Pillow, but forgive him now-he is the man for the occasion." A sober, modest citizon, an old line Whig and ex Governor, was heard to say Saturday afternoon, on being asked how the fight went on : "First-rate-Pillow is giving them h-ll, and rubbing it in."

The dispatches closed on Saturday as they had for three successive days before-"the enemy are soundly and expected to have great news on the morrow. About 9 o'clock Sunday morning I rode out into the country seven or eight miles, and leaving the turnpike, dined with a friend in one of the quiet and luxurious farmer homes of Middle Tennessee. Returning leisurely, I struck the pike about 4 P. M., and as everybody I had met in the morning had asked me the latest news from the city, I asked the first man I met. Any news? Prepared to hear only of victory. "News! What's the last you've heard ?" "Last night's dispetches."

"None since? The last out and plenty of it Fort Donelson has fallen and Nashville is surnow on the Capitol and the gunboats will be up before sundown."

fought in the West. This is but the beginning. The people realize now what is at stake, and they will measure out wealth and blood without

NO 23-

After taking my family as far as Decatur, I re-turned to Nashville on Wednesday. The stores were closed and bolted ; the streets deserted, cave by a guard here and there, and a press gang taking up every menthey could find and sending him to load covernment pork into barges, upon which it was being taken up the river and put out of the enemy's way. Had a stand been made before the city, or even a feint of a stand, no doubt all the government stores could have been removed safely. As it is, vast amounts have been thrown away, wasted, given out, both from the quartermaster and commissary's departments. At one time the doors were thrown open to whoseever would, under the impression that they had better let the poor have these provisions than the enemy who was expected instantly. A friend said he saw quantities of meat lying on the roadsido, where persons, having overloaded their carts had brown it out. Barrels of flour, sucks of coffee, tierces of lard and meat, were rolled into private houses and back yards, with hundreds of boxes of candles, boits of cloth, & . After wards this order was countermanded, as the enemy was not exactly at the door, and a guard placed over the stores and an effort made to get them of byrailroad and boat: Private carriages, hacks and carts were stopped in the street and pressed into service; and some of my friends had to get their bagoage to the station in wheelbarrows. Advantage was taken of the confusion and dismay of the hour for private injustice and irresponsible oppression. The selfishness developed in such a crisis is humiliating.

The opinion prevails there that Nashville will be burnt, first or last-if not when we leave it, then when we drive the enemy out of it. For Tennesseeans are resolved that the enemy shall net rest on their soil. Gen. Floyd and staff left Thursday morning, and it was understood that Capt. John H. Morgan, with his company, would retire slowly, as the enemy in force entered. The Louisiana Cavalry, Col. Scott, were near Franklin, on their way to the vicinity of Nashville, where they will act as scouts and hold the enemy closely in bounds.
