POETRY.
BEAUTIFUL SKETCH.
Yes, I remember her: I saw her first In the sweet prime of womanhood—the rose
Of health, in youth and dewy freshness, bloomed Upon her cheek; and from her dark blue eye
The spirit of each new-born thought looked out In undimmed expression, and diffused a glow Upon her face its own pure loveliness!
O, she was one of those for whom earth seemed Ever to summer beauty—flinty brows Wetted to smiles—and hearts unsworn to feel,
Softened to tenderness—'neath her sweet smile,
Each evening's glances, and each voice,
In its tones, spoke welcome; and the world
Was proud of her. Yet she, so loved, unloved,
And followed, was all meanness—her whole heart
A deep, pure fountain of blessing—such she was!
A change came over her: she fell, blinding heart
Of slander, like the syren, passed. Her eyes
The sun had kissed away, she saw no more
The loveliest form more ever loved on earth.
She was alone—pale, pale, but smiling still
Friends who had looked but for her slightest smile
For happiness, had long forsaken her—
It was a summer eve—the sun had sunk
Down from a golden sky, whence brightly streamed,
That ruddy glow, the aura of life,
That glided like a lovely dream, on all
The gilded landscape: the sweet breath of flowers
Came on the silent air, stealing the soul
Of angels; heaven, commissioned to soothe
The mortal anguish of the dying saint.
She looked with a mild sadness on the scene, Yielding like her—'And I had hoped, the said,
My evening's glances would see in full view,
'Like the life of the world'—the visitings of scorn Are fearful to the young and innocent heart!
She sank beneath them—and the pitying earth,
Whose bosom never spurned a child Of sorrow, nor refused a grave, Hath decked her grave with freshest green and flowers.

laugh, will strike the discord, as miracles of wit and sagacity. Thus:
Fair Dolls, thy glowing aureole Like Phœbus, on my lovely heart arise,
Was handed to a lady with blood-red locks, And instead of azure, grey owl's eyes, and therefore, some infernal wight might propose that her head should rise like the sun, and that it were better to put her eyes altogether out of the stanza.

At a party which I lately attended, there was a couple, both young and fair and unmarried, perpetually billing and cooing, in corners and out-of-the-way places, much to the annoyance of mere spectators. The young lady was repeatedly and politely invited to dance, or to sing, or to wait; she O, she was one of those for whom earth seemed
Ever to summer beauty—flinty brows
Wetted to smiles—and hearts unsworn to feel,
Softened to tenderness—'neath her sweet smile,
Each evening's glances, and each voice,
In its tones, spoke welcome; and the world
Was proud of her. Yet she, so loved, unloved,
And followed, was all meanness—her whole heart
A deep, pure fountain of blessing—such she was!
A change came over her: she fell, blinding heart
Of slander, like the syren, passed. Her eyes
The sun had kissed away, she saw no more
The loveliest form more ever loved on earth.
She was alone—pale, pale, but smiling still
Friends who had looked but for her slightest smile
For happiness, had long forsaken her—
It was a summer eve—the sun had sunk
Down from a golden sky, whence brightly streamed,
That ruddy glow, the aura of life,
That glided like a lovely dream, on all
The gilded landscape: the sweet breath of flowers
Came on the silent air, stealing the soul
Of angels; heaven, commissioned to soothe
The mortal anguish of the dying saint.

These very notions, however, are Cupid's fac-tious and agents, for one of them, which I acknowledge from the bottom of my heart to be a good one, was the parent of a very pleasant love-story. In the rapid interchange of these Parthian arrows, one will sometimes take effect.
A fair damsel, with a mind as beautiful as her person, was whispered as betrothed—She appeared in company, as it was surmised, for the last time, before the solemn ceremony—as the poets would happily name it. As a farewell privilege and pleasure, a gentleman of no ignoble mien and manner, requested permission to offer her one motto—only one. It was graciously granted, and he offered these simple and touching lines:
Peace to that heart—though another's! be!
Health to that cheek—though it bloom out for me!
There was an eloquence and a brokenheartedness in them that could not be forgotten. She learned them by heart—she gave them to her memory, in trust, for ever.
Wherever she was, after that pathetic gift and presentation, in all circles, she remembered it as if it had been the music of a broken lute. The thoughts of immediate marriage were repulsed; she would think of it —there were now two persons in the world —a short time since there had been but one—her lover and intended. A revolution took place in her mind—the result of meditation, feeling and poetry, mingled together.
She married the man of the motto!

On the other hand, presenting to a bow-legged, withered old gentleman nearly half double, a couple, whose thimble was "his your duty" to love such plainly may be excellent nonsense. ALSO.
I have, therefore, a plan which I would lay deferently before the public. In grey beard times, long past, every gentleman's family, in England, consisted of one extra fool in motley, who was ready at joke and doggerel. I would restore this valuable custom, in a manner, to this community, by having engaged a law forcing every individual, who gives parties or soirees, to support a poet for furnishing motes. This law would be severe in enforcing poets to be kept by bankrupts; in fact, from their extraordinary surplus of means, they should be ordered to keep two, or perhaps, three.
I would have the poet of a good family, and used to the best company.
He should be fed on puff, cream, cabbage and other easily digested exquisites, that his verses might be the more airy and light. He should be hired by the hour or yard, just as he has been most accustomed to rhyme. A place should be assigned for him in some conspicuous part of the parlor, where he might be seated, with a small table in front. If, then, any two in the room felt in a humor to cross-fire a little poetry at each other, they should advance to this table, and standing in front so as best to display each point of the person, as if getting measured by the tailor or mantua-maker, should call for two motes.
The poet should be allowed to tell no lies;
but, if the hair was red, or the nose was swab, say so at once; in fact, he should be engaged, each evening, to fight a mortal combat with vanity. To aid his ear, while rhyming, he might have an assistant to stand at his side, and vibrate the rattle, or, perhaps, considering its general quality, the music for the dancer would do as well. In the pauses of the demands for motes, the poet might make himself useful by snuffing the candles and stirring the fire.

MISCELLANEOUS.
A WORD IN BEHALF OF MOTTO MAKERS.
There is a class of writers which has never obtained from the public the plaudits due to them; they are a modest generation, and have never dunned for it, though it already amounts to a handsome sum and well worth collecting. I allude to the motto makers, or that regiment of Parnassus, which shoots its small two stanza arrows into companies, parties, and assemblies of divers colors—Their fame has been growing, like a squabpigeon, in corners, until now its wings are nearly full-grown, and it is ready to fly—only requiring some benevolent and trusty person to open the parlor doors and let it out. I am that same person—and to fit myself for the task, have spent an hour each day for the two weeks past, in searching for their names—names and cognomen—to attach to these yet unappropriated poems.
With this object, I have teased my friends, the book-sellers, beyond bounds—and the confectioners have not rested, night or day, for the questions on this subject, I have incessantly poured upon them. So far did I urge one in this respectable class of citizens, as to wring from him the exclamation,
"that the 'did' care a curse for the authors—and that he was obliged to put large lumps of sweets in, to make their stuff palatable!"
This was certainly curious language for a Christian—and the confectioner is one—for he sings regularly (and very loud) at church, every Sabbath.

Patent Netting Machine INVENTED BY JOHN McMULLEN,
OF BALTIMORE.
FISHING Nets and Seine, made on the above Machine, can be supplied to dealers in and consumers of the article, at the low price of 30 cents per pound for inch meshes. The arrangement of the meshes is the same as in the hand netting—the knot is the common netting knot—and the uniformity of the mesh, perfection of the knots, entire freedom from slip knots and no possibility of the regularly being in large sections as often occurs in those made by hand, make it in all these respects far superior to hand netting.
Persons wanting Seine are invited to call and examine, in a few days, a specimen of the work at the Office of the "Register."
Manufactured and sold by
