: The murder of Melville by De Corn. u Nev York, on Thursday last (says the Richmond Dispatch.) is one that excites u Eagene Melville was a young Frenchman, about 25 years old. He had not been long in this country, and had lived in New York. Cincinnati and New Orleans. In the named city he met with Emma Eag Woods, a native of Connecticut, who had started to California to meet be uncle the but being taken sick at Chagres also retur-to New Orleans. Mobile travelled to New Orleans. Molville travelled wit Miss Woods to New York and there may ried her in October last. His wife, in her testimony at the Commer's inquest, briefly tells these particulars, and furnishes a hint at in her bushand's death. Site atsted that De Corn, the murderer, and his partner, Girand, were at the weddings that she and her husand had lived together since their marriage till about eight days before the murder; th on had an income of $600, which her hus and had exhausted in his own expen band had exhausted in his awa expenditure tearing their board unpaid; that she had enported him; that he had grawn jealouk of Mr. De Corn, and frequently, threatened to take his life; she added: "Mr. De Corn has been a good friend ha h to Melville and myself; he has heared on money to enable me to my my. board," Quite a remarkable statement for a

Melville called to see De Corn on the morn returned, and without any creemeny, shot Melville through the body—the latter betrays eault would have exhibited. Melville fell hack, exclaiming, " Good Got, Mr. D. Corn :" and died. De Corn escaped, old was found in Melalla's Rhom, at the Frank-
