AGRICULTURAL.

We observe an inquiry made in the June number of the Southern Agriculturist as to the best mode of getting rid of his tprolific and invincible rooter. In answer to the in-Rev. D. Bachman of Charleston, who is at this time the most distinguished naturalist in America, informed them that after the great fire in that city which occurred in 1836, the nut grass sprang up on the site of a hurned use that had been erected over half a century. From this fact, the inference is rather incidentally drawn, that its eradication is next to an impossibility. Now we very much though the logicality of this deduction. It is n well established fact that perfectly matured seed may retain their vitality for centuries; and yet the same seed may lose their vitality under unfavorable circumstances in a very short time. Nor does the length of time which seed may retain their vitality, bear any relation to the tenseity of life of the parent plant. When is well known to be a tender and discate plant, and that the vitality of is berry is often destroyed on the stalk by a few days of untavorable weather; and yet perfeetly matured grains have retained their vitality from the days of Joseph and the Pharaolis up to a period qui e recent.

That nut grass can scarcely be eradicated about six teet in diameter in his yard, and set the saying is, it was as thick as the hairs on a cow's back. In the spring of the third year, shaved it off with a line, by which be effects ally prevented the growth of foliage.
