POETICAL.

From the New-York Evening Post. THE LOST PLAYMATE. BY MRS. PROBE OVREY. I hear the children shouting In their spring-time of delight, All that used to play together, All but one are here to-night. One we laid in peaceful slumber, Away from all-life's ills, When the roses of the summer time Were dying on the hills. And we often think about him, Where the shadows darkly wave, Though we know the blessed Savior Has not left him in the grave ! O, he had such shining ringlets, Such a fair and noble brow-"Fis strange his little playmates Never seem to miss him now. Strange his name is never spoken, As in sport they shout and call; When the lost one was the fairest, Was the brightest one of all. And how often here I've seen him, When the day, as now, grew dim-O, of all that play about me. There is none that looks like him ! And his witching, childish actions, His earnest, loving face, Every little word he uttered, Haunts me in his lonesome place. But there's one than me most faithful, Cherishes each look and tone, One whose heart is ever crying For the lost one that is gone. All his playmates may forget him, All his little friends that were, But his mother, O, his mother,

He has never died to her !

The Buckeyes of this region are in the hab. of making a certain kind of ketchup which I have found nowhere else, and have, there fore, taken the liberty to call it " The Ohio Ketchup." It is an article that should in every household. You must pardon me for not at. tempting to give you an idea of its delicious. mess, because my pen cannot do justice to the subject. The season will soon be here when this "happy combination of vegetables" can very easily be made. I will, therefore, transcribe the recipe for the benefit of your readers: Take about three dozen full grown cucum liers, and eight white onions. Peel the cu. cumbers and unions ; then chop them as finely as possible ; then sprinkle upon them three. quarters of a pint of fine table salt ; then put the whole into a seive and let it drain for eight hours ; then take a tea cup full of mustard seed. half a cup of ground black pepper, and mix these well with the cucumbers and onions; then put the whole into a stone jar and fill up days it will be fit for use, and will keep for years. Let all your readers give the Ohio Ketchup fair trial, and you and I will receive sixty housand thanks for letting them into the secret of making it. E. B. R. Springfield, Clark co., Ohio, 1850.

Planting. The ground should be well plough. ed and harrowed, and laid off in rows twelve inches each way, the seed being dropped in the angles.

The necessary quantity of seed is from four to five pounds per acre. They should be plantrd in April. The plants require no after culture. So soon as the seed turn black the heads should be removed ; when the whole are gathered, the seeds are easily flailed out. The stalks of an acre of ground will yield one thou sand pounds of potash for which purpose they can be burnt and used in making compost. It possible they should be grown upon swampland well drained ; this is necessary, as they rapidly exhaust the land of potash. The seed can be bruised in a common cider mill, and it the oll be wanted, pressed in the cider press.

The oil burns with a brilliant flame, and fragrant odor. Most farmers would find this to afford the cheapest and best light. The leaves STILLS AND TIN-WARE while green, afford most excellent food for stock.
