GUANO AND PLASTER ON CORN AND CLOVER.

We promised our subscribers to give them, in our present number, some account of an experiment made by us in the course of the last year, with Guano and Plaster on corn and clover. The corn land experiment was ten acres of a field of about 1500 square feet, which was exhausted, and had been some years since, and hence was up in sedge and poverty grass.

The manured was considered the poorest part of the field. In the previous year the land was plowed with one of DeGiles, Nourse & Mason's Centre draft plows, which run from 5 to 9 inches deep and completely reversed the sod. This plow was followed by a one horse sub-soil gopher, which run some three or four inches deeper, making the whole from eight to ten inches. The soil experimented on is somewhat light, having a due admixture of sand. The sub-soil is a stiff red clay. The land thus prepared lay until the usual time of planting, when it was laid off with a short narrow plow, at a distance of five feet distance, and in this furrow, the corn was planted three feet apart on the row, and covered by ridging lightly on it; care being taken not to disturb the light coat of vegetable matter that had been buried by the turning plow. And we will here state that, for the same reason, the crop was cultivated all together superficially with the cultivator and sweep, and one time each, with one hoeing. Mark this, brother farmers, and reflect how much labor might be saved in the cultivation of our crops by properly preparing the land.

For we assure you, from our own experience, that land having but a slight coat of vegetable matter on it, thus prepared will need no plow in cultivating the crop—for, even if it is stiff and adhesive, it will not run together so as to require a second, third, or fourth breaking, except the crust that forms on the surface, which may, and should be broken with a cultivator, harrow, or sweep, only; and with either of which may be passed over rapidly and with comparatively light labor to both men and horse. Excuse this digression, and we will proceed to state how our manure was prepared, applied, and the result. In preparing our compost we used the Peruvian guano and plaster of Paris, ground coal dust, or rather the scrapings from the coal house floor, which was passed through a coarse grain sieve, and leach ashes, in the following order and proportions:—First, a bushel of coal dust (as well as term of) spread to about two inches thickness; second, one gallon (½ peck) of ash, spread uniformly over the coal; third, the same quantity (probably as much as was necessary) of plaster with one bushel of coal dust; fifth, half bushel of leached ashes. The same was continued until the quantity of guano and plaster procured was exhausted. The heap thus formed, remaining undisturbed for two weeks, when it was leveled over—which we were convinced at the time should have been done earlier, in order to prevent the setting of the plaster which we were not able again to reduce to a powder. This setting, we presume, was occasioned by the moisture imbibed from the damp coal dust, and might have been prevented by shovelling over the heap immediately after it was finished.

The Application.—Of this mixture we spread in a circle of 18 to 24 inches diameter, around each hill of corn, when from six inches to a foot high, one gill, and followed with a light cultivator, as near on each side of the corn as could be not to tear it up. This partially covered and mixed the compost with the soil. In this state it was left, through a drought of some weeks, without much apparent benefit. After the first rain, however, we saw the corn was taking the start of that in the same field not manured. It continued to gain on it to the maturity of the crop, and resulted in a gain of 33 per cent. over the unmanured portion, which was ascertained by gathering two rows manured, leaving two, one manured, and one unmanured. The corn was measured in the ear only, and the manured rows not only measured more, but was better in appearance than that from the unmanured rows.

By calculation it will be ascertained that the quantity of both guano and plaster applied to the hill, was but the one-eleventh part of a gill, or one twenty-second part of a gill of each. Consequently, there being 1024 hills, five by three, in an acre, it will only require about half a bushel of each guano and plaster to an acre.

Clover.—Of the above mixture we spread five, and a half bushels on an acre of red clover which was equal to a peck each of guano and plaster, and which resulted in a most decided improvement of the crop. We regret that we did not leave a portion unmanured that we might have ascertained the difference in the product. Judging from appearances, however, we have but little doubt that it was doubled by the application.
