Table with columns for location, date, and time. Locations include Jamesville, Farmington, Madison, etc. Dates range from July 12th to 26th.

THE PLATFORM NORTH & SOUTH.

So far as the feeling of the Know Nothing party of the North, in respect to the Philadelphia platform, has been developed through the press and by popular demonstrations, they unanimously and emphatically repudiate any recognition of the rights of the South. They applaud the accession of the representatives from the North, and heartily approve their protest against the Nebraska Bill, and the aggressions of the slave power.

and fanatics, causing them to issue a formal protest against its doctrines, to secede from the Convention, and return angry and grumbling to their homes! The Baltimore manifesto, which is the object of so much pride and boasting to the Enquirer, had no such effect. It was so wishy-washy, ambiguous and non-committal that even John Van Buren and most of the Buffalo Free Soilers had no scruples about endorsing it.

The following is the concluding portion of a story from the "Olive Branch." We omit the first part for the sake of brevity, the latter containing all the main points of interest. From the Olive Branch. PLAIN CHARITY

The table, spread with all delicacies, in and out of season, had been awaiting an hour, and Mrs. Underhill was becoming impatient, and all eyes gazed with watching down the road for the shining equipage of the celebrated preacher.

Charity thought he was watching the fading light of day, and his horse as he fed in the near pasture, and so did not disturb his meditations, but as she went about her work, kept up her spirits by singing hymns. By-and-by the people were all gone but she, and having spread the table a second time neatly and nicely, she invited the stranger to eat with her which he did, making himself so agreeable while the while that Charity could not forbear telling him she was more than repaid for the loss of the evening sermon.

What has he gone into the pulpit for? whistled Mrs. Underhill to her husband. Does he suppose he can fill Mr. Westbrook's place? "Hush," answered Mr. Underhill, "we have made a most dreadful mistake."

THE POISON'S SOMETIMES EATEN. The London Quarterly Review has a curious article in its April number, on the adulterations in food in the British metropolis. It is similar practices are in vogue in great cities on this side of the Atlantic, people in our days not only eat the "peck of dirt" assigned to them by the old proverb, but so small quantity of poison also.
