THE TAIL OF A TADPOLE.

A blade of grass is a world of mystery, "would men observingly distil it out."—

When my erudite friend, Gerands, glaneling round my work-room, arrested his contemptaces eye on a tase abounding in tadpoles, and asked ms with a sniffing and tadpoles, and asked ms with a sniffing superiority:

"Really I begin to think there is more in the time in the time in more in the time in the time is more in the stand of study to get at these things."

"Not more than to get at any of the other, in will love you forever!"

"But your wife! You may find that the tadpoles come bobbling against the side of the glass. Do you see how they are covered with little white spots!"

"No."

For a poetical contribution. Our con We give the lines but cannot say to wheer they belong. There are only two men in the country who could have written them; Longfellow and James Avis Bartley. Al though the versification is comewhat fanciful, there is not polish enough about it. for us to suppose it to come from Long fellow's pen; and our own rare Apie, has promised you.' I almost wish I had not been so busy recently with other subjects, promised you.' "No."

"Look closer. All over the tail there are tiny cotton-like splots. Take a tens if your unaccustomed sye isn't that pen ough.
