MISCELLANEOUS.

FOR THE TARBORO' PRESS.

ADDRESS,

Delivered by Josiah H. Brooks, Esq. at the Celebration in Tarboro', N. C. on the 4th of July, 1846.

This nation fears nothing from foreign powers. If she has a superior in arms, that superior is yet to be found. England once esteemed such an idea as vain and delusive, and at the commencement of that contest, which resulted in our freedom from her oppressive measures, she apprehended but a slight injury. In her vast conceptions of her own exaltation, dignity, and power, certain of victory, she had already arranged the plan, that the leading revolutionists should suffer the horrid death of traitors, and as an inevitable sequence, that the colonies would tamely return to an allegiance to the mother country. Washington once remarked, amid his darkest prospects, and when that star, which had guided him through so many anxious toils, and nights of sleepless solicitude, seemed to be hiding itself behind a gloomy cloud, that after all, he could not think that his neck was ever made for the halter. He was surrounded by other kindred spirits, whose fortitude, patience, courage, and determination to conquer or die, began to convince that America, though a country comparatively wild, and romantic, contained undrilled militia, that were too strong for regularly trained British soldiers. England, like a champion, who had always been victorious, and had left his enemy at his feet, wounded, bleeding, and suing for mercy, could not realize, that she was defeated by a few scattered colonists. The hard fought battle of Yorktown closed the scene, and put the question beyond a doubt. Writhing under the pangs of wounded ambition, and mortified pride, she sought leisure to repent over her own folly. But this ambitious, this restless champion, must have a second trial; and in that trial she became perfectly satisfied, that Americans not only knew how but were still determined to defend their rights. And the complacency, and courtesy with which she now seems to come into measures, evidently show, that she has not forgotten the ever-to-be remembered, and glorious eighth of January. To the present test of our skill in arms, on the banks of the Rio Grande, I scarcely know how to refer. The Americans show such instances of daring bravery, such fortitude and magnanimity of soul, such a lofty contempt of death, as truly to exemplify the sentiment, that:

"They who fight for freedom undertake
The noblest cause mankind can have at stake;
Religion, virtue, truth, what'er we call
A blessing, freedom is the pledge of all."

And we hope, that the contest will result in placing in the chair of those Mexican presidents, whose conduct has disgraced their own history, and shocked the feelings of humanity, a republican governor, to perpetuate the principles of our own country.

The most effectual preservative, the grandest palladium of our Republican government, is the religion which gave it birth. It was the principles contained in, and breathed forth from the New Testament, which first planted the germ of political freedom on the western continent, first laid the foundation of this mighty republic, and still sustains the towering fabric. The struggle for religious freedom was the dawn of political liberty. It is a nation's religion, that forms its character. In confirmation of this, I appeal to history, that ever living witness of past events. Evidence in its support can be brought from every age, in the history of man, since there has been a revelation from heaven. Take for instance, the case of revolutionary France, that nation which, by a legislative enactment, said, "there is no God." The political condition of France was never more prosperous, than at that time. Science was never in a more advanced stage. All the useful and fine arts, and polite literature, were advancing with an unprecedented rapidity. But when the flood of infidelity, as if impelled by the deity, rolled its dark billows over that nation, the sun of her prosperity dropt suddenly from its zenith, and her national greatness, as with one solitary brush, was all swept away. I speak not of that religion, which seeks to entrench itself around the throne of kings, notorious for inventing the instruments of torture, and kindling up the flames of persecution, and has stained the earth with so much blood: but I refer to that religion, which imparts to a community an elevated tone of moral feeling, a correction of judgment, a sublimation of thought, and a refinement of taste; that religion, the rule of whose moral action was handed down by the deity, from the heights of Mount Sinai, where rolled the awful thunders of his power, and where played the vivid lightnings of his majesty. Guided alone by the glimmerings of depraved reason, America could never have stood, as she now stands, elevated to a position beyond which no nation dare aspire, and the basis of whose reputation shall remain unhurt, amid the fluctuations of time. But directed by a higher, a purer, a holier principle, she will never consent to take down, in despair, that waving flag, which she has unfurled in commemoration of a most glorious triumph. Fellow citizens, would you leave, unimpaired, to your posterity, the blessings bought for you, with the blood of those, whose ashes now repose beneath the plains of Concord, Lexington, and Yorktown? Gentlemen, would you have your sons to be the bold defenders of free institutions, to live superior to the turbid stream of popular applause, and to love freedom, for freedom's sake? Ladies, would you have your daughters not only prepared to move in the circle of refinement and fashion, but to be, as by a late lamented patriot they have been pronounced to be, the queens of the forest and the pride of America, then teach them, that the plain and simple precepts of divine Revelation are worthy of all acceptance, and form the basis of true greatness.

It seems indeed that war must occasionally come, and in its appalling desolations, blight the fairest prospects, and fondest expectations. Many promising youth have sunk beneath its oblivious grasp, and there remain unknown; like the purest gems, that lie concealed in the ocean's darkest caverns; and the fairest flowers that, in the wild desert blush, and bloom unseen, and scatter to the blast their withered leaves. Who does not deprecate the horrors, and miseries of war? Who would not hail with ecstasy, and thanksgiving, the prospect that nations should no longer groan and bleed, under its influence. Read the history of but one battle, and what is the picture? The killed are thrown promiscuously into a pit, and hastily covered; there indeed to rest from the fatigues of war, but to lie unknown and forgotten. In that number, were buried the blasted hopes of many a parent. Perhaps there was a young man, who had left the paternal roof, with the blessings of a doting father, and was followed to the field of battle, with a mother's prayers, and a mother's tears. He had left his home in obedience to his country's call, cherishing the fond hope, that after the clangor of arms was hushed, and the noise of the battle was stilled, he would meet them again, in the enjoyment of happier days, brighter prospects and fairer fortunes. He never returned, but probably in his last sorrowful hour, conversing with them through the medium of fancy's too often illusive vision, and thinking of the home, around which clustered his purest affections, he had only time to commend them to the mercy of the Almighty Dispenser of human events. Of this man history is silent: not even a solitary tomb-stone marks the place, where his dust reposes. But amid the desolations of war, the mind may indulge a pleasure, where a high ambition is gratified, even at the expense of humanity. The retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, and the fate of Leonidas and his immortal band, cannot be read without admiration; but with how much more admiration, with what generous satisfaction, with what an enthusiastic glow of sentiment, can we read of the still brighter achievements, even now, of our own army, under the gallant and heroic Taylor. That very same indomitable courage, magnanimity of spirit, which once made the British throne tremble to its centre, is still displaying itself in the expansion of the principles of our government; and may it continue until it has effected the universal political redemption of the world.

How proud is the condition of the American youth! how interesting to the patriot, and how pleasing to the philosophic historian! Born amid the soul inspiring influence of the most happily adapted systems of religious & political institutions, an hereditary heir to a country, than which heaven never smiled upon a happier; educated in the doctrine, which teaches freedom of thought and speech; subject to a government, as firm in her purpose, as the eternal granite that bases her lofty mountains, and as elevated in her character as their towering summits; his condition is more desirable than that of the Autocrat of all the Russias. But even in this interesting country, while hope lights up his future path, and plays in the sun-beams of his fancy, there are multitudes of temptations, under the withering grasp of whose deleterious influence, many a youth, ignorant of his danger, has been pulled down from his elevated pursuit, and sunk into the depths of infamy, a wreck upon the waste of time. How unconscious were our first parents, when placed in the garden of Eden, that the enemy of their happiness was so near! Imparadised in each others charms, they did not dream, that around that delightful place, where angels kept their daily and nightly vigils, there crawled a serpent, infecting, with its poisonous breath, that pure and salubrious air; and that beneath those beautiful flowers, beneath those beds of roses, there lay concealed a demon ready to destroy their bliss. Let American youth remember, that whatever may be the brightness of their prospects, whatever may be the heights of their ambition, it is from the experience of the past, from the text book of human affairs, that they must arm themselves to escape the temptation, which may impede their progress in enterprising and laudable pursuits. Let them remember, that they are under an allegiance to respect, honor, and love the country, for which the immortal band of heroes of the Revolution so faithfully, and so indefatigably fought, and on which they have erected that proud banner, now bedecked with so many bright, and shining stars, reflectors of the rays from the brilliant sun of liberty. And may heaven grant, that tyranny may never eclipse that sun, nor dim those stars; but that other additional ones shall continue to rise, and unite themselves, until, on the broad Pacific, beyond the Rocky Mountains, and above their sunless gorges, there shall be seen to rise a still brighter star, seeking to mingle its congenial rays with this already blazing cluster.

One thing, above all others, bespeaks the happy tendency of our government, and its superiority over that of others, and that is the elevation, to which it assigns the female character. The ladies are not only all patriots, but they are emphatically the lights of this lower world, to dispel the gloom, which would otherwise surround us. During that doubtful contest, in which this nation was struggling for existence, they exemplified some of the heroic virtues, such as patriotism, public spirit and fortitude, and sacrificed the softer feelings, and domestic affections, by cheerfully giving up their fathers, their husbands, their sons and brothers, to the service of the country. If the women will go for their country, we dread neither the despot's wrath, nor the tyrant's rage.

From the Fayetteville Carolinian.

Our latest accounts from Nauvoo and the anti Mormon camp state that there are about 1000 armed men encamped within sight of Nauvoo, who are drilling and exercising in military manoeuvres. They say they are determined to march into the city, as soon as their force amounts to 1500—about 100 volunteers per day coming in. The Mormons and new citizens on the other hand are fortifying the place, and making every preparation to sell their lives as dearly as possible.

We look with great anxiety for news from that quarter. Such a state of things is hard to be realized by us off at this distance.
