Tarboro Southerner.
THURSDAY, MAY 31, 1883.
From the Norrisville Herald.
SOMETIME.
BY EDWARD A. GIBBARD.
Within the chamber of our heart there lives A silent joy that lends each life its aim. And goes to us on trails of wealth and fame. This book of mellow, dreamy goodness drives Through each dear soul a compelling which re-appears.
I have no objection," answered Hattie quietly, but she felt quite dizzy.
In a few moments Dr. Pell had gone away.
Before she had in the least righted herself there was another knock at the half opened door, and Mr. Deslonde walked in.
Mr. Paul Deslonde was the most slightly dressed man of Hattie's acquaintance. He was very handsome, his manner was fastidious, and she had always stood a little in awe of him. Judge, then of her surprise, when, having seated himself in her little sitting room, and chatted easily for an hour, he very gracefully made a proposal of marriage.
"My father wants me to marry, and being usually arbitrary, I am exceedingly grateful to him that he does not insist on making the choice for me, but leaves me free to please myself. And this is no sudden fancy. I have known you long, and admiration has ripened into esteem. Will you take my proposal into consideration? Hattie caught her breath. She looked very pretty with the maidenly reserve mantling her features, the long, dark lashes shading the pure cheek; but these words brought such a beating to the girl's heart, she felt as if she were in a whirl. "I will take your offer into consideration, Mr. Deslonde," she syllabed mechanically.
She felt entirely incapable of saying any more. And then Caddy came running in with the ammonia bottle, and Mr. Deslonde's conversation turned to generalities, and then he took his leave.
Nobody will wonder, I think, that Hattie was very much excited. It was not unpleasant excitement. She was flattered, she was encouraged.
Doctor Arthur Pell was very much respected, though he was not rich. Paul Deslonde was very wealthy. Such a proposal from either was very flattering to a poor girl whose father had been only fortunate. Not that Hattie was a bit in love with either. How could she be when she never had dreamed of marrying either of these gentlemen? It was all so very unexpected!
The days and weeks went on. It was a very pleasant change which had come to Hattie—drives and visits, and flowers sent up to her modest little room. The odors of things brightened even the tedious school hours. Yet, even when a month had gone by, Hattie had not even approached her decision. She possessed, in her two suitors, an embarrassment of riches.
They were very different. Paul Deslonde was brilliant, captivating, so apt with arts and graces of the social life, she could not help wondering what she should have chosen, if not assuming a little maid as herself.
In truth, it was Hattie's peculiar air of docility and modesty which had attracted Mr. Deslonde. He liked to rule. Dr. Pell was practical, with an air of reliability about him which spoke loudly for him to Hattie's lonely heart. She had needed just such a man so long! Yet the frank, dark blue eyes which were Doctor Pell's only beauty were often eclipsed in the young girl's mind by Paul Deslonde's elegant form and face.
She tried to be wise; so much depended on this decision of hers—all her life's happiness. Which did she like better? She could not for the life of her tell. Both strove to please her, and were often very agreeable.
She wished sometimes that she could see them from a different standpoint such as her lovers. She tried to look into the future, imagining either for her husband, but all was so vague!
But at last came the point when Hattie was able to decide.
She was shopping one Saturday afternoon and went into a stationer's to make some purchases. When the goods she had ordered were put up, she sat down in the back of the store to wait for her car, which would not be due for half an hour. She was glad to rest, too, and entertained herself with a stereoscope.
Suddenly she heard Paul Deslonde's voice. For the first time it struck her that there was something sharp and cutting in it; or rather, she remembered that she had recognized that quality before without criticizing it.
She observed Mr. Deslonde now attentively. He purchased a little steel implement—an ink eraser. The salesman wrapped and handed it to him. Mr. Deslonde overlooked the proffer.
"Send it up to the house at once. I am going directly home, and I shall want to use it," he said curtly.
"Certainly, certainly," answered the clerk, with an air of apology. "I thought perhaps—it is so small."
"I never take my purchases; the delivery is your business," said the gentleman went out, and the salesman muttered something to a fellow-clerk about the car.
But another customer came in. It was a broad shouldered, forid man, with pleasant blue eyes. He seemed to know the salesman, and chatted with him as he carefully
