ABOUT CONKLING.

Well, he thinks Arthur should have had a stronger Cabinet. He thinks Folger an old fogy, Brewster an old fool, Lincoln a worthy but uninteresting young man, Chardler a small trickster, while with Teller and Gresham he finds no fault. Then Conkling thinks the administration thus far has missed a great opportunity. He thinks well of Secretary Frelinghuysen, but regards it as very strange that he should have permitted England to crowd our ports with the paupers and suspects of the United Kingdom. Conkling says that is going to be a ringing issue in this country—the question of the exclusion of this most worthless class of emigrants and that the administration could have made a great point and strength for itself by taking an early and bold stand upon this question."—Chicago Times.
