His Big Friend,

I watch the east glowing and brightening: The sun shows himself in the sky. And I hear the birds singing and chirping In the wild plum thickets close by. I see the corn waving and nodding. As though it would welcome the light, When the bright blue arch of the heavens Throws off the dark curtains of night. I list to the voices of morning. And pleasant to me is the call Of the winds, the brook and the wild birds And peace folds her wings over all. I feel my whole nature expanding.

My heart brimming over with praise, For the peacoful delights of the country And heart-rest I find in its ways, For sweet are the voices of nature. Whispering through woodland and fiel And I feel there is much of divinences In pure country places r

"were wolves," wolves that bore charmed lives, and possessed the power of roaming about without leaving any trail by which they could be followed. Tom Ballard was a famous hunter of that day. He was entreated by the farners who had been losers by the raids of the mysterious wolf, to hunt it down if the this were possible, although many be-lieved it was a were wolf. Ballard started out in the spring of 1822 with his dogs and gun for the purpose of killing the wolf. He roamed the wildest parts of the woods for several days, but could find no trace of the animal. At the end of the fifth day he came to a crevice in the rocks on the southern edge of a hill known as Mount Pisgah. There was no outward evidence that it was a wolf's den, but he resolved to enter the cave and find out. He crawl ed in on his hands and knees and found two wolf whelps a week or two old. He wrapped them up in his blanket and quickly withdrew from the cave. He did not meet the old wolf, and started for home with the two young ones. He placed them in his wood house. Three nights later he heard a great noise in the yard. Looking out he saw an old wolf trying to get into the wood house. It was the mother of the whelps. Ballard shot her. She was an unusually large one, and as no more raids were made on the sheep pastures of the region it was believed that she was the one that had given them so much trouble. The whelps grew up in captivity. They
