M. Lafayette, a descendant of the great Lafavette, and one of the most prominent men in the French upper chamber, has been talking to an American reporter about some things in this big country. "We Parisians th. ik that no place in the world comes up to our city of life and gayety. However, parodying the words of Alexander the Great, I may confess that if I were not a Parisian I would ke to be a New Yorker. We have no one sees, for example, in 23d street. But that is not what struck me the most. Here in Paris everything is for the rich. Paris is the earthly bliss of the moneyed man. The democracy before which I bow exists in Paris only as a thing to be alked about, written about; in New York the democracy it an actuality and has its alace. There are cheap boarding houses -unknown in Paris-and although the cen ral idea is that New York is a terride expensive city, one can, nevertheless, live there at half the price required for Paris.
