EXTINCT RACES OF MEN. lodern Greeks Have Nothing li Common With Their Ancestors Except Name.

The discoveries which are coninually being made, both casually or accidentally, and by the scientific se of pick and space, of the evi ences of our forefathers' lives and abits-back into the far, dim, and nisty past-are aggestive in many ways. But it is hardly realized perhaps how not only countless ions of individuals have made the rief passage of existence, but that which once flourished vigorously, while among the crags and precipit are as extinct as the mammoth and he dodo. Some died out ages ago at unknown dates, others have gradnally faded out within recent times, while yet others are surely dving. if some extinct races there still xisus-if the bull may be allowedescendants of representatives of a sind. The mere thought of Greece and he Levant is suggestive of races ong extinct.
