WHY THE JAPS MUST HUSTLE

The onslaught upon seemingly mpregnable positions by the Japanese is explained by the New York Times. The possible coming of the Baltic fleet makes imperative an immediate capture of Por-Arthur and an equally decisive campaign against Gederal Kuropatkin. At this time the Japanese are numerically stronger than the Russians wherever they are in contact, hence when the Japanese inflict a loss as great as that which they sustain their relative posi tion for the time being is improved, for the Russians cannot overcome the superiority of the Japanese in many thousands more of men from Russia. Only by reaching decisive victories at an early day can Japan hope to escape from an overwhelming final disaster, for the heavy drain on the resources of Japan is already telling. She has only limited reserves of men and money, and no reserves of ships, while Russia's resources are unmerous. The sum of the whole is, "The Russians can afford to meet defeat for a time; the Jaranese must secure supreme victory soon or not at all."
