Disarmament

By PHILIP B. WINDSOR, Associate Editor of Tryon Daily Bulletin

Another point upon which the unthinking public has not been enlightened by the politicians in different countries who advocate drastic cuts in armament budgets as a means of alleviating taxpayers' burdens, is that there exists a considerable element of humbug in the economies which might thus be effected and what might be done with them.

In the first place, the American public has been continually nourished with the idea that if European nations reduced their armament costs, the savings could be employed to pay war debts. This is, of course, wholly false and misleading. The savings thus effected cannot be transferred to the United States as payments except as and to the extent that they can be converted into exportable goods that we will receive.
