Disarmament

By PHILIP B. WINDSOR, Associate Editor of Tryon Daily Bulletin

In the second place, it seems to have been wholly forgotten by those advocates of disarmament for economic benefits to the world that the vast army of people directly and indirectly employed in the production and maintenance of armaments and dependent thereon for their living, as well as those actually serving in military organizations, must be provided for when a drastic cut is made in armaments. This is not, of course an argument against disarmament, which every one admits is desirable from all points of view, but it should be considered thoughtfully by those who are estimating the savings to each nation and the expected relief to taxpayers. As a matter of fact, the soldiers who would be dismissed and the workers who would be thrown out of employment must be provided for in some way and, since it does not now seem possible for all workers to be employed in productive enterprises, it is probable that they would have to be employed in unproductive work supported by public funds. This is a big problem and must be solved before drastic armament cuts can be made, and to suppose that such drastic cuts can be made without first considering this problem, is to display very little knowledge of the difficulties involved.
