National Publicity

A Washington (D. C.) newspaper announces in big head lines the arrival of Nature's great Pageant—Forest Tints in the mountains of the Carolinas. "Nature's great pageant starts with leaves in the highlands. Display is declared most beautiful in North America." The newspaper article stated in part, "Heralded by faint leaf tints the annual glamorous pageant grows in intensity to a climax in late October and early November.

"Remarkable for its diversity, the forest color pageant in Western North Carolina is one of the most brilliant to be seen in North America. The mountains of the section are cloaked in forests which boast of 140 different varieties of trees and hundreds of varieties of shrubs.

"At the height of the color display, entire mountain slopes appear as though draped in some rare Oriental tapestry. Sharply brilliant colors blend with subdued tints and great areas of multi-colored broad-leaved forests are outlined with mountain-summit belts of somber-green spruce and balsam forested lands."
